Since worship had its origin in man's contemplation of his own nature, in observing himself reflected from the mirror of his own thoughts, in fearing and reverencing his own qualities seen illusively in the objective world, the conclusion seems unavoidable that the continuance of worship must depend upon the continued recognition of a personality like himself behind or immanent in the world of phenomena. To say that God exists, that it is our duty to worship him, that worship consists in contemplating his majesty, his goodness his love, in adoring and praising him for what he is as well as for what he does, and then to say that all our conceptions of him are but illusions, that all our thoughts of him, on which our admiration and love are founded, are no representation of him at all, that he is an unknown and unknowable something entirely beyond our comprehension—these two statements taken together are, it seems to me, quite inconsistent and absurd. On hearing them the first time, a mind unperverted by theological teachings would, I think, wonder whether God, if anything, were not really a demon amusing himself by making man a victim of illusion, deception, and fraud.

A god has no significance or value for an ardent worshiper unless he can contemplate him as a being like himself, who approves and disapproves human actions, who sees man's movements, who hears his words, who sympathizes with him in misfortune and distress, to whom he can appeal when in need of aid, and from whom blessings come in response to prayer. What cares the devotee for the "absolute," the "unconditioned," the "unknowable," a god without any of those human qualities with the contemplation of which in fear, in reverence, in love, worship commenced and worship has been sustained through all the ages of man's existence as a religious being?

The Spy System in the United States.

There are two ways to get the better of an opponent; one is to meet him in open and fair conflict, and the other is to stab him in the dark. The former is regarded as the manly way, the latter as the method of thieves and assassins. Just now in Russia both of the two great conflicting parties seem to hav adopted the dark lantern policy. The Nihilists plot and the emperor counterplots. The regnant authority humiliates itself by following suspected persons into their houses and homes, and questions servants, follows women, bribes anybody, and descends to any sort of meanness to compass its ends. The other party follows similar tactics; it explodes mines, encourages assassins, and rivals the imperialists in the Guy Fawkes line of business.

In our humble way we imitate those imperial and plebeian conspirators. We hav a wonderful detective system, by means of which married people of either sex who wish for divorces can be accomodated. If a cashier or clerk makes an enemy he can be "shadowed," and brought into infinite trouble and expense.

There is, however, one man who seems to hav reduced this spying business to a science, and to hav enlisted the clergy, churches, and many of the laity to bring grist to his private mill. It has been reserved for us in the United States to turn out the champion sneak of all nations and times; for Tony Comstock, although not by many a thousand the first who has made his profit by crawling, is, so far as we know, the first who has tried to make crawling respectable, and to establish it as the really proper and honorable method of progression through the world. The strange thing in the matter is the facility with which respectable people—clergymen, judges, and other excellent citizens—suffer themselves to be hoodwinked and humiliated into the position of peepers at keyholes and surreptitious readers of private letters. Men who would scorn to read even an open letter lying unguarded before them will eagerly peruse letters which it is certain were not intended for them to read, and the time of courts with all the attendant expense is taken up in the investigation of some alleged case concerning the use of naughty words in a private letter.

People hav a sort of blind terror of unseen attacks, and the boldest lion may be scared by the fluttering of an old shirt on a pole. These "detectives" and curators of private morals hav found this out, and they hav a great deal of fun as well as profit in seeing how people who are worth a thousand times more than they are become frightened by the waving of their miserable rags.

The safeguard of all purity is frankness and openness. There are many things in the life of most men and of many women which they would prefer to keep out of sight; and this is only saying that most men and many women are imperfect. But it is a mistake to set up for absolute perfection, and a great deal better frankly to recognize fault and challenge examination.

The spies and sneaks of society find their profit in the lack of honesty and the desire to appear better than it is, which is so common a failing of humanity. Comstock's profitable business would soon come to an end if his victims would just laugh in his ugly face and defy him.

Perversion of Law.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: What an awful thing is law in a republic such as ours! The Constitution is the supreme law, and all acts of Congress or state legislatures contrary to the Constitution are utterly null, void, and of no effect. Not the unanimous enactments of all the law-making bodies in the Union hav the least effect if contrary to that solemn, supreme law—the Constitution. And so tender is the law of the rights of men that in criminal cases, where the accused is guilty of crimes of the blackest dye, if there be the least doubt as to the constitutionality of the statute he is tried under, he must go acquitted and free. How much more so is this the case where offenses created by statute—actions harmless, even laudable, in themselves, but forbidden by the law-making power—are the subject of judicial consideration. If an honest court should recede with horror from the first unconstitutional step towards punishing one proved guilty of murder, how should it act in a like case of accusation of having made a contract, accepting a present for labors rendered, or of selling tobacco without license, or sending a lottery ticket, or advertising on a bank-bill, or using a copper boiler without registry, or violating a postal law, or sending forbidden matter through the mail, or selling books deemed obscene by some people? etc., etc.

In addition, to save citizens from persecution and guard their rights, the laws hav provided, from immemorial time, that no one shall be tried except in the county of the fact—that is, where the act was committed—and hav placed a great number of safeguards around the accused, such as requiring witnesses to come on his summons, trying him near his home where his character and that of his accusers are known.

When the Constitution of the Union was framed the founders were most jealous respecting those rights. When it was proposed to giv Congress a general power to punish offenses, not only the great majority of the members of the convention, but the whole people, were aroused to anger and scorn. "They would never allow it; never adopt such an instrument." So when power was given to Congress to punish treason, piracy, felonies on the high seas, counterfeiting United States coin and securities, offenses against laws of nations, offenses arising in the army, navy, forts, etc., and no other offenses whatsoever, the makers of the Constitution declared in the debates why they did so. Read the speech of Holmes, of Massachusetts, on that subject. What a fearful picture he presents of citizens dragged from their counties for trial among strangers! And everybody in the thirteen colonies agreed that 'twere better to be under British despotism even than under such a condition. Read Patrick Henry and Madison and Randolph and others. A measure was proposed to giv Congress power to enforce the powers already given, and all other powers, by legislation, necessary and proper to carry them out. Madison said it was not necessary, because the grant of a power carried with it the grant of all powers necessary to enforce it. Patrick Henry said, Congress might assume power to punish other offenses. Madison and others said they never would venture to do so. But to satisfy this scruple the amendment number ten was made, declaring "all powers not granted are reserved to the states or people." And all parties were satisfied.

But as in Congress there are always enough men who are ignorant and careless as to the measures they vote on, and others who are blindly factious or corrupt, soon a bill in direct contravention of the Constitution was enacted to punish sedition and another to punish frauds on the United States banks. This raised a storm that swept the old rotten unprincipled partisans of monarchy from power. Jefferson and Madison, who, Webster said, "knew the Constitution better than any men that ever lived," drew up the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions. Jefferson was elected President. The above is a brief history of the matter.

How then does it come that to-day the courts of the United States will (the Constitution never having been altered on the point) by a strained construction in a criminal suit where the defendant is accused of a mere statutable offense (mala prohibita), of merely exercising one of his natural and inalienable rights—yes, inalienable, so help me God! if such a thing there be!—dare to convict and punish with the highest penalties, fine and hard-labor imprisonment, when the founders of the Constitution, with the whole nation to back them, refused to giv this power to punish even crimes every man's conscience told him were wrongs? Yes, refused it in their discussions; refused it in the instrument itself; solemnly reiterated that refusal in amendment number ten; rose up and repeated it ten years afterwards when Congress tried to punish sedition and fraud. In the name of all the gods at once, is there not doubt here, to say the very least? Amend your Constitution; let such men as Bennett go free, with ten thousand others you are oppressing thus lawlessly. Yes, 'tis the courts are the criminals in such cases. Judges sworn to regard the Constitution are the offenders, and Congress also participates and should be equally liable could it not plead idiocy. Here is tyranny unspeakably wrong added to it. You drag men hundreds of miles from their counties, and compel them to defend themselves at their own expense and never reimburse them. Here is the sum of it. A citizen livs under a free constitutional government, he is told. He reads in that Constitution that Congress cannot punish any offense except what is named therein. He is an attorney, we will suppose, and being called upon to prosecute a claim against the government by a poor man, who is unable to pay costs for witnesses, agrees, as is customary with lawyers, to do it for a contingent sum, and advance the costs. He gets his money. Ten years afterwards he is told that an act of Congress existed making his laudable act a penitentiary crime. But Congress had also declared all prosecutions were barred in two years, and the Constitution says Congress cannot punish any offenses but treason, piracy, etc., etc. His act is not one of the classes over which Congress has power—surely he is safe. But no! He is indicted secretly, dragged hundreds of miles for trial, forced into trial, found guilty, and sent to the penitentiary, while a heavy fine is put upon him, and meantime his home is sold to pay it and his family driven into the streets. Is this an exaggerated case? No! I swear it is not. Cases without number similar to it hav occurred. No appeal from district courts.

Mr. Bennett's Reception.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been noticing the many suggestions of our friends regarding Mr. Bennett's reception at the close of his prison confinement. I am quite sure that but few comparatively know more of the deadly hate of priesthood towards the Liberals, and of their determination to destroy Liberalism, than I. Hence, I know this occasion requires a manifestation by all lovers of liberty that will last long after a ride upon the Hudson in her most magnificent steamer, or a dinner at Delmonico's dining table will be forgotten, although thousands of our friends and workers may be there, and nothing could giv me more pleasure than that Mr. Bennett's reception should astouish the civilized world. But as these costly manifestations are but relics of religious barbarism, and as a nation's reception cannot do honor to Mr. Bennett, a nation's tears cannot erase the blot his imprisonment placed upon the fair brow of our Declaration of Independence, or illumine the stars upon our nation's flag with their wonted brilliancy. Hence, let us use wisdom in this matter. That an unparalleled reception should be given this man, whose unjust imprisonment has caused his friends so many sleepless nights, I know, but with as little expense as possible. If we would advance the cause of Liberalism, it must be by educating the people, or if we would use our money to the best advantage to stop the rapidity of the car of destruction which the priesthood, behind the screen, are so adroitly engineering, and every now and then beneath its weight crushing some of our most needed and noble men and women, we can do no better than to sustain and circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER, a paper open for the discussion of all questions pertaining to human progress, whose editor has not carried the load of aristocracy upon his shoulders till he has become humpback, hence afraid to meet the enemy. Now let such of us as hav five dollars, more or less, to spare, use it to place THE TRUTH SEEKER in the hands of those who cannot otherwise hav it. I really think that a half a dozen TRUTH SEEKERS properly circulated in a city like this would educate the people more than a Liberal League of two hundred members without it. I hav little or no influence in this direction, neither do I wish to exert any, but I must appeal to the friends that they do not unnecessarily use money for one day's manifestation. Also we who cannot attend Mr. Bennett's reception in New York city, let us, upon that day, call the people together in our own localities, expressly to review the matter of stamping out our Liberal literature, and understanding we are to raise all the money we can to circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER in our localities. Let every Liberal League in the United States do this, and we will soon find the priestly tyrant weakening in power, and the people advancing in education, which alone can save this nation from the chasm of ignorance and slavery now at its feet.

Ninth Letter From Albany.

PENITENTIARY, April 4, 1880.

MY DEAR FRIENDS: I have now entered upon the last month of my imprisonment. Before another four weeks has passed away I shall, in all probability, be restored to liberty, to breathe nature's free air and to walk forth untrammeled and bask once more in the rays of the glorious sun, which shines for all (save those in prison). I need not tell you I am glad that my days behind the bars are so nearly over. You can all easily understand that few things are more repulsive to a human being than to be immured in prison month after month and to be deprived of that cherished liberty which nature vouchsafes to all. When locks and bolts and bars no longer restrain me, I believe I shall prize this dearly loved liberty more than I ever did before. I feel that I have been unjustly and cruelly deprived of my dearest rights, and when I am permitted to enjoy them once more I shall love them with increased ardor and devotion.

Yes, I have been deeply wronged, and in more ways than one. And now, as my term of imprisonment is drawing to a close, it may not be amiss to take a brief review of these injuries. First, financially, the cost of my arrest, trial, fine, and imprisonment, including attorneys' fees, printing bills, help to fill my place in my business, extra prison expenses, and much else not necessary to particularize here, amounts to more than three thousand dollars. Certain losses which hav occurred in consequence of my being taken away from my business amount to two thousand dollars more. These five thousand dollars are far more of a loss than my little business is able to stand. True, friends have been very kind and have generously contributed to help meet expenses, but, unfortunately, the balance between loss and gain is decidedly on the wrong side of the ledger. The greatest wrong, however, is not a financial one. My imprisonment, with what has grown out of it, has made a serious draft upon my health and vitality. I have felt latterly that I have grown old more within the last ten months than in any previous ten years. Prison confinement and deprivation are not conducive to health and longevity. Five years of imprisonment, with the hardships attendant upon it, often prove sufficient to break down the strongest constitution. I have seen seven persons breathe their last since I have been here, and not one had passed middle age, and all died of diseases contracted in prison. At one time others thought—and I had good reason to think so myself—that I was in a fair way to wind up my earthly career, and wholly from the effects of my imprisonment.

The effect upon the mind of being unjustly subjected to such wrong is probably greater than the effect on the purse and body combined. A person who has never been placed behind bars and bolts can scarcely realize the severe punishment it is. It is an unceasing torture—a rankling wretchedness that pen cannot portray. I sometimes wonder how the miserable and dishonorable sneak and informer who was the means of my being placed here would like to take a year's trial of his own medicine, which he so fondly administers to others. Could he have ten years of prison labor, prison confinement, and prison fare, it would no more than atone for the deep wrongs he has done to others. I wonder too if District-Attorney Woodford feels that he has occasion to congratulate himself upon the part he performed in the despicable business of sending me to an undeserved prison. He knows the charge against me was pitiful and frivolous, and yet he authorized the oppressive proceedings to be commenced against me. He is naturally a man of better knowledge and kinder instincts; he has a fine front head, a good intellectual development, and a sympathetic, kindly nature (he ought to be a Liberal), but he is a member of the Young Men's Christian Association and Comstock's Obscene Society; he wants to please his rich Christian friends, and that tells the whole story. It is to be presumed that Mr. Fiero feels well satisfied with the conspicuous part he played in this persecuting drama, He has the appearance of one who is always well satisfied with himself and his achievements. And that Christian jury—with a Sunday-school superintendent for foreman—which deliberately sent me here for exercising one of the guaranteed rights of an American citizen, it is to be hoped, feel an immense amount of self-satisfaction for the narrow views they were able to take of the case and the unfeeling prejudice they exhibited in rendering their unjust verdict. It is to be hoped their reflections for the last ten months touching the case have been placid and happifying. And pious and very Christian Judge Benedict, with the soul of a bigot, whose rulings and instructions in my trial were most unjust and unfair, doubtless exults at the deep injury he was able to inflict upon me, and would gladly repeat the same with fivefold severity. He is a very fair exemplification of the class of judicial tyrants which now curse this country. He exhibits an absolute delight in saying, with particular pomp and emphasis, to a poor unfortunate fellow-being, "The sentence of the court is that you be confined at hard labor in the Albany Penitentiary for the term of five years." These men named represent the majesty and dignity of this great nation, and they manipulate one of its great courts, but it is most pitiful that the United States has not better representatives. It is pitiful that the courts and the officials of this country, whose government was founded by the best men that ever lived, should have sunk so low as to persecute an unpopular man because he is honest to his own convictions and dares to differ from Mrs. Grundy and her church party. This is precisely what was done in my case. The pretext upon which I was indicted and convicted was the merest kind of a sham. Several copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and a copy of my "Open Letter to Jesus Christ"—which were repeatedly held up before the jury and referred to, together with the fact that I am one of the largest Infidel publishers in the country—had more to do with my conviction than had the copy of "Cupid's Yokes" mailed to Comstock under the lying name of G. Brackett. Yes, it is a sad reflection that our proud government, established by Franklin and Washington, both of whom were decided unbelievers in the fundamental dogmas of Christianity; by Jefferson and Paine, the first an Atheist and the second a Deist; by Hancock and Adams, who did not acknowledge the false claims of our current system of religion—it is sad, I say, to think that the government of their founding has sunk so low as to lend its power to crush an honest thinker and an honest speaker of his convictions, in harmony, too, with the founders named. This has been done in my case; and all the lies that Cook, Comstock, Colgate, and Crosby can tell in a year cannot disprove it.

Since my last letter to you this prison has been visited by a representative of the government, Acting-Commissioner C. K. Chase, Esq , regularly employed, as I learn, in Attorney-General Devens' office, the Department of Justice. He made his annual visit to see the condition of the United States prisoners confined here, and to learn from them personally whether they have any complaints to make. Each United States prisoner has a private interview with him, and is at liberty to say to the commissioner whatever he wishes. I had no complaint to make of the treatment I have received from the officers of the prison, but some about the treatment I have received from the government or its representatives. I said I thought our government had reached a pretty low point when it lent itself to carry out the behests of religious bigots and persecutors. He assented to the remark, and seemed familiar with my case. He said he had sympathized with me and tried to do all he could to secure my release from prison. He had called upon the booksellers of New York city, and learned from them that some of them had sold the same pamphlet upon which I was convicted, and that they thought it an outrage that I should be sent to prison upon such a charge. He said he was fully of the opinion at one time that I would certainly be liberated; but it was not quite accomplished. I remarked that it was singular, while so many men prominently connected with the government pronounced my imprisonment a gross outrage, that I should still be allowed to wearily drag out month after month in a terrible prison. I said I had seen a letter, written some months ago by Secretary Carl Schurz to a friend of mine in the West, in which he decidedly characterized my imprisonment as a great wrong, and said he had assurance I would soon be liberated; that Secretary John Sherman had said much the same to friends of mine; that Attorney-General Devens had clearly expressed the same sentiments; that Pardon-Clerk Judge Gray had several times decidedly given the same opinion; that Col. W. R. Rogers, the President's private secretary, had to my wife declared the whole crusade against me a great outrage; that even the United States marshal who took me from Ludlow-street Jail to bring me here, said a great wrong had been committed upon me, etc., etc.

"Yes," replied Mr. Chase, "that is just the way it is; every man I know of connected with the government is in favor of your liberation, except the President, and him alone. The fact is, Bennett, the church is too strong for you; that influence has secured the co-operation of the President, and it is too strong for you."

Truer words were never spoken. The influence of the church has been wielded against me, and it has temporarily triumphed over me. Although over 200,000 citizens, good and true, asked the President to release me, and though the President himself admitted I had violated no law and deserved no imprisonment, he disregarded the prayer of the 200,000 and preferred to obey the behests of the church. He even went so far as to sign a document touching my release, which document went to the Pardon-Clerk and was seen by a gentleman of this city; and the Pardon-Clerk, in his own office, told the clerk of this prison to set me at liberty; and though the President gave my wife strong hopes that I would be set free, still, when the church said, "No, Bennett must not be liberated," the President was false to his own convictions, false to his own sense of right. He listened to the demands of the church and dared not disobey. He refused to take another step toward my liberation.

As I have before said, Mrs. Hayes is much to be credited for my continued imprisonment. She is an ardent devotee of the Methodist church. She loves the church dearly, and loves her pastor nearly as well. All the pastors said I must be kept in prison, and Mrs. Hayes said so too; and then the President also said I must be kept in prison. A friend in Iowa has written me that some attache of the Western press while in Washington played the part of Jenkins, and wrote letters home very laudatory of Mrs. Hayes, praising in the highest terms her amiability and goodness of heart. All that, perhaps, is very well, but, unfortunately, she is an ardent Christian, and hates Infidels with a hearty intensity. She may naturally be one of the finest women that ever breathed, but she has no sympathy or charity for an unbeliever, and prefers him to be in prison to enjoying his natural freedom. In my opinion she would have been perfectly capable of playing the role of Bloody Mary, Queen of England, who burned to death two hundred and eighty unfortunate persons who dared to believe differently from herself; or the role of Queen Elizabeth, her sister, who was scarcely less cruel, and who signed the death-warrants of hundreds of people, wholly because they did not mold their belief according to the pattern prescribed. They were zealous Christians, even as is Mrs. Hayes. They believed in punishing unbelievers. So does Mrs. Hayes. The mode has changed somewhat in three hundred years, but the spirit of persecution remains much the same. Then it was the rule to burn, behead, hang, rip open the bowels, and torture in various ways those who were so criminal as not to believe as the church and state commanded. Now burning, beheading, and hanging for opinion's sake have gone out of fashion, but sending to a dreary prison is still a favorite Christian pastime.

Yes, the church has been "too strong for me." It forced my arrest, it forced a trial, it forced a conviction, it forced me from my family and friends, it forced me from my business, it forced me into prison, and it came near forcing me into my grave, which was the destination it had in view for me. Yes, yes! the church has been too strong for me! Can it be strange, then, that my love for the church is not intense? In view of the enormities it has practiced for centuries, in view of the hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of unhappy mortals who by its heartless cruelty and intolerance have been brought to the torture-racks, pulleys, wheels, feet and leg-crushing "boots," ripping knives, red-hot pinchers, heavy chains, loathsome dungeons, the scaffold, the beheading-block, the stake, and the flames—is it strange then, I ask, that I do not love the church? The church indeed may be too strong for me, but in view of the great wrong it has done to me, and the far greater wrongs it has done to my unfortunate fellow-beings, I owe it a debt which to pay I shall toil hard while I have life and strength. Yes, the church may be too strong for me, but I shall try to wield in opposition to it all the strength and vigor I can possibly command. I know the church is strong. I have realized it, I have felt it, but truth and right are really stronger. I have enlisted under their banner, and I will not prove recreant to them. The church may be strong, but I will trust in the eternal principles of justice, and in these I will try to be strong also. I will oppose the church; I will oppose intolerance; I will oppose hypocrisy and falsehood; I will oppose the spirit of persecution and proscription; I will oppose superstition, bigotry, and fraud. I will try to be as strong as possible, and do all in my power to spread the truth before my fellow-beings, and show them the superiority nature, rationalism, and reason have over supernaturalism, superstition, and lies. Had I a life before me as long as is ascribed to the mythical Methusaleh I would cheerfully spend it all in this good work. Truth is so much superior to error and falsehood that I will love it and follow it forever.

Solomon was not correct when he said there was "nothing new under the sun." Even now, twenty-five hundred years after he is said to have lived, we have new things under the sun. It is a new thing for this government to lend its courts and its power to crush and imprison people for opinion's sake, but it has done it within the last year. It is a new thing for the earnest request of 200,000 citizens to the Executive, asking for a just and reasonable act, to be utterly ignored, but this has been done within the last ten months. It is a new thing for this government, early declared to be unconnected with any system of religion, to now be controlled by the most intolerant system the world has ever known, but this we have seen within the last forty weeks. It is a new thing for the clergy and their dupes to undertake the control of the Executive of our nation and tell him whom he may pardon and whom he may not, but this too we have seen within the last two hundred days. It is a new thing in this government for a President to yield to the dictation and bidding of the ecclesiastical party as to what course he shall pursue and what steps he shall take, but this we have for the first time seen within the last ten moons. It is a new thing for the President's wife to assume to say whether a pardon shall be issued or not, but this we have seen in the present administration. It is a new thing for a man to administer the chief executive power in this great government, whom the people did not elect to the position, but this too we have seen for the last three years, but may we never have to witness it again! May frauds of all kinds cease to flourish in our land, and may honesty, truth, justice, and righteousness become the governing principles of national and individual conduct.

I have spoken of the tyranny of our judges and our courts. I feel almost impelled to refer to them again for a moment. They are subjects upon which I have thought much. They are an evil that has assumed immense magnitude. Our system of justice too often becomes the merest farce and mockery. Our courts and our judges cost the people of the country immense sums of money, and in return they ought to do a great amount of good, but whether the evil they do is not greater than the good is a problem for every man to debate in his own mind. One thing is most sure. Our so-called courts of justice often perpetrate great injustice. The rich man, or he who has rich and influential friends, seldom receives severe treatment from these courts. A man with plenty of money may even commit murder, and if punished at all he is let off very lightly, whereas, if it is a poor man, one without money or friends, the heavy hand of the law crushes him to the earth. He finds no mercy; he gets the severest sentence, and a pardon rarely is issued for him.

I have realized the inequality of modern justice since I have been in this prison more than ever before. From what I have learned, about thirty-three per cent of the persons sent to prison are really guilty of little or no crime. Far too many innocent people are sent to prison. And again, the inequality of sentences for similar offenses is most apparent. For instance, one man was sent here for two years for making and passing counterfeit money. He was an old offender, and the sentence was not too heavy; but another man, who seems to be a well-disposed, harmless person, for carrying from one acquaintance to another a pair of dies for stamping half dollars, and in which he had no interest—he never having made or handled counterfeit money—was sent here for six years. He is nearly sixty years of age, and it is very doubtful if he lives to serve out his sentence. Another man, for handing a ten-dollar counterfeit bill to a second person, who was explicitly told that the bill was counterfeit, and for which no consideration was given, was sent here for seven years. He has contracted consumption here, and will hardly live to serve out half his term. Many are here for getting drunk. I know one man who was sent here for a year from this city, whose only offense was drinking with a friend in a private house and getting pretty mellow. The police saw him, took him before the police judge, and swore he was intoxicated, and a year in this prison was the penalty. Many are sent here from the South for making illicit whisky. Eight were sent from one court in Lynchburg, Va., upon this charge. I got acquainted with two of them who became ill and were sent into the hospital; one a young man, apparently of good character and disposition—we both worked in No. 8 shop and near together—a carpenter. He contracted typhoid fever, and I saw him close his eyes in death. Several days before his death he assured me he was sent here on wholly insufficient grounds, and that he had not made a drop of whisky nor been in any way connected with it. A designing deputy United States marshal had sworn falsely against him for the fees he made in securing convictions. It was touching, in the delirium which preceded his death, to hear the poor young man talk about his mother and sister, and call upon them, and to see the great anxiety he felt to go to them. Death released him. I saw him carried out in a pine box. Another man is serving out a sentence here for obtaining a single quart of illicit whisky and selling it to a United States deputy-marshal, who requested him to get it for him, and for the express purpose of getting him into trouble and himself pocketing the fee. That must have been a regular Comstock sort of fellow. Other cases of severe hardship from unjust trials and tyrannical judges might be detailed almost to any extent, but I will not detain you with them now. While I have been writing these lines, and within the last half hour, the Catholic chaplain who preaches in the chapel here one Sunday in four, Father Maurice Biere, an educated, gentlemanly German, has been in. The subject of courts and unjust judges became a topic of brief conversation. He suggested a rule of action that rather meets my approval and that is, that candidates for criminal judges and prosecuting attorneys, before entering upon their offices, shall serve one year in some state prison or penitentiary for instruction, as military cadets are sent to West Point. This would give them a realizing sense of what they were sending their unfortunate victims to, and might make them a trifle more merciful. I would not object to Judge Benedict taking a term of one year, just to show him what he has so unfeelingly sent others to, who are better men than himself. But that would be too much genuine justice ever to take place. He will rather continue for life to draw from the government a salary of several thousand dollars a year for giving men unfair trials and then sending them to prison.

But, my friends, I fear this does not interest you. I think you have heard from me before upon this subject. I will not weary you longer with it now. How would you like to hear a little more from Mercury? He has been here again, or rather I have had another dream. Everybody, you know, has a right to dream in his own bed. You must understand, then, that I sleep in my own bed. I did not quite like the prison bed, and being permitted to have one of my own, my good wife had one sent me, so I have since done my dreaming in my own bed. I am independent to that extent. I insist that I have a right to dream as much as I please, and about Mercury or anybody else. I am glad there is no law against dreaming, with fines and imprisonment for penalties, for in that case I would not dare acknowledge I had had a dream. There are still a few privileges left to men, for which let us be duly thankful. I hope no society will be organized and chartered for the suppression of dreams. Let dreaming continue to be free.

It was on the night of the 31st of March. I had retired at the regular bedtime hour, 8 P. M. We have to go to bed at that hour whether we are sleepy or wakeful, and cannot rise till five in the morning, even if our sleep is out at three. Prison rules are a trifle arbitrary, as you might observe should you decide to test the matter. I had fallen asleep at about nine, and took a comfortable nap of three hours or thereabouts. I awoke, partially refreshed, and lay awake some time in quiet meditation. That is a good hour for meditation. When everything is quiet and I have had a good sleep, I can meditate with a very slight effort. I will not detain you to detail what my meditations were; it is enough to say the subjects were diverse and sundry. From active meditation I passed insensibly into a dreamy state, though partially awake. When one is in that condition he can hardly distinguish his meditations from his dreams. At about the smallest hour of the night I insensibly passed into a state of unconsciousness. I had again fallen into a sweet sleep, more sweet, perhaps, than profound. The second sleep is the most favorable for dreaming. I can dream more in one hour of my second sleep than in two of my first. For that reason I do the greater part of my dreaming in my second and third naps. On this particular occasion I was in very good dreaming condition. As near as I can estimate, I had not been asleep over fifeen minutes when a tall, good-looking figure approached my bedside. I saw in a moment it was Mercury. I smiled one of my blandest smiles upon him, and said:

"Why, Mercury, I am glad to see you. How do you do?"

"I was never better in my life," said he. "I see you are pretty well. I am glad you are pleased to see me. I much prefer calling on people who are glad to see me. How have you been since I saw you last?"

"Oh, pretty well, I thank you. I had slight rheumatic pains, with stiff joints, for a few days, but they passed away. I have been able to eat my regular allowance and to maintain an equable state of mind. I have been pretty busy with my literary work, which has occupied the greater share of my attention."

"Yes," said he, "I am well aware you are working steadily on your forthcoming work. I often look in upon you when you are not sensible of it. I see you have already done more than you intended when you commenced. I observe you are making two volumes of it in place of one, as you proposed at the start."

"Yes, the subject is an extensive one, and grew so upon my hands that I found it would be too much for one volume, so I have added to it considerably, and there will be two good large octavo volumes. Volume I. will treat chiefly upon the gods, and Volume II. the religions of the world."

"Just so. I keep pretty well posted in the matter, and take not a little interest in your enterprise. You are as industrious as myself. I think your work will be an interesting one and I hope the patronage of your friends and the public will well reward you for your labor. I think it the largest work that was ever written in prison, and I am sure nobody has ever undertaken greater subjects."

"I thank you, Mercury, for your compliments, as well as for your good wishes. The work has been a labor of love to me and has aided in whiling away many a weary hour and day, and even weeks. The time here in prison has hung far less wearily on my hands than it would if I had had no occupation of the kind. I am glad, too, that the opposition that was raised against me, up in your part of the country, has not damaged me any."

"Oh, never you fear, Bennett; that kind of opposition will never be a serious injury to you. I would scorn to give it a passing thought."

"Tell me, please, Mercury, how all the gods are, since that convention, and tell me also whether you had an adjourned meeting."

"Well, the gods are extremely quiet. They soon fell asleep after their wearisome effort at the convention, and I don't believe some of them will awake again for a thousand years. No, we did not have an adjourned meeting. None of the committee were in favor of it save Jahveh, and when he saw how the rest felt he was not half as anxious for the second meeting as he was for the first. His zeal has cooled down very much. I wish for my part that he had not wished to get up any meeting at all, for it made a large amount of work for me and I don't believe I will get anything for it."

"Why, how is that? I think you told me Jahveh said he would make it all right if you would get all the gods together and put the matter through with your accustomed ability."

"Well, so he did, and I expected he would at least do the honorable thing by me, for between you and me, I put in two weeks of the hardest kind of work on that job, and that is all the good it has done me. When I presented my bill to him for services rendered, he grew red in the face, became much agitated, and soon flew into the fiercest kind of a passion, and said he did not consider he owed me a cent. The convention did not entertain his views nor second his wishes, and as the convention had done him no good he was not disposed to pay anything for it. I felt indignant, of course, to hear him talk in that way after what I had done to accommodate him and the faithful services I had rendered; but I kept cool. I said I had warranted no success, nor was it any fault of mine that he was disappointed in his expectation. All I had undertaken was to secure a place for the convention and to get all the gods to be there, and that was enough for any ex-god to undertake. I said I did not wish to boast, but I did not believe there was another person in all the celestial regions that could accomplish the undertaking so thoroughly and get so many gods together in one place as I had done. I added that my charges were reasonable and I hoped he would not think of doing less than he had promised. Upon that he hemmed and hawed, hardly knowing what to say. But he remarked that he presumed it would be a good deal of a disappointment to me not to get my money, but he was sure my disappointment could be no greater than his had been. He had expected big things from that convention, but had realized nothing at all. He was sure his disappointment was greater than mine. I saw his drift, and I remembered he was a Jew god, and that he undoubtedly was trying to drive a sharp bargain with me. I told him I was very sure my charges were reasonable, and if he thought they were not I was willing to submit the matter to arbitration. He might pick a god and I would select one, and the two might select a third, and whatever they would decide upon we would stand by."

"Well," said I, "you were very fair with him. I should not think he could object to that proposition."

"But he did nevertheless. He said he would stand by the arbitration if it was what he thought right; but he did not want to be gouged out of what was his own. He had been shabbily treated by all the other gods, and that was a good reason enough why he should not pay for being insulted and opposed. He only made a reasonable request of the convention, but among all the gods that were present there was but one that seconded his views, and that was a nigger god from Africa, and he would much rather he had kept still. 'No, Mr. Mercury,' said he, 'I don't think I ought to pay you a single red cent. Nor do I think you ought to demand it.' I was almost confounded at his injustice, and was meditating as to what course to pursue, when just at that juncture his brother Satan, Lucifer, or Splitfoot, as he is sometimes called, came in. He extended his hand to me in a most genial manner, saying:

"'My dear Mercury, how do you do? I hope you are well. You look troubled. What is the matter?'

"Oh,' said I, 'your brother and I have had a little transaction of a business nature, and we cannot think alike about it.'

"'Why, what is it?' said Lucifer; 'let me know all about it. It is a pity if you and my big brother here can't settle a little business matter without trouble.'

"I then explained to him how I had gotten up the convention, and how I had traveled twice all over god-dom to stir up the gods and get them out; and then, because they did not fall in with his vindictive spirit, and help him to crush that TRUTH SEEKER man, he was now unwilling to pay me for all I had done. Upon that he turned to his brother and spoke in this wise:

"'O Jah, I am ashamed of you. If you engaged our friend here to perform certain services for you, and you agreed to remunerate him for it, pay him off like a man. Don't try to sneak out of it now because you did not accomplish your dishonorable purposes. Come, for the family's sake, do the fair thing. I don't want to feel that you have disgraced me in this matter. I would rather pay Mercury myself than to have you wrong him, as you seem determined to.'

"At that Jahveh bristled up and said:

"'Luce, I cannot see how this becomes any business of yours. You might as well attend to your own affairs. You have always been interfering with my business, and I now give you to understand that I wish you would let my business alone.'

"Then turning to me he said if I would come back in ten days he would talk with me further and tell me when I could call again. My bill was receipted, so I did not leave it with him, fearing he might take some advantage of it. As I was about leaving, Lucifer told his brother that there was no occasion for him to fly into a passion about a little trifle. That was an old game of his, but he had never made much by it, and probably he would not in this case. Lucifer joined me after I retired, and laughed heartily at the peculiarities of his big brother, as he called Jahveh. Said he:

"'My brother has always been noted for splutter and bluster, but they avail very little. He has often made himself very ridiculous by it. That was a foolish enterprise of his, getting all the old gods together. He might have known, even had they the disposition, that they could do no more to injure my friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER than he could do himself. Jah is great for getting up tempests in a teapot, but they all pass over without harming anybody. I often am much amused with him. He has been a study to me for some thousands of years. But you stick to him for your just dues. I think you will get your pay after a while, but if he does not settle up with you fairly I will, and take my chances for getting it out of him. I guess I can worry it out of him. You shall not be cheated out of it. Good day, Mercury.'

"Well, indeed, Mercury," I remarked, "you are having quite a time in getting your money for the hard work you performed. Did you call on Jahveh again at the expiration of the ten days?"

"Yes, I called, and that was all the good it did. He used to say that no one should call upon him in vain, but that is all gammon. I have proved to my satisfaction that it is not true. When I called, he said he had been annoyed a good deal about matters and things on the earth that did not go to suit him, and he had not given my matter much thought, and he wished if it was not too much trouble to me that I would call again in ten days more. I observed to him that this was a small matter; that I had served him faithfully, and had made the price very reasonable, and now I could not see any propriety in his keeping me running for my pay. 'Well,' said he, 'the services you performed did me no good whatever, and I don't think I ought to pay you, but I'll tell you what I'll do. Times are hard now; if you'll discount your bill fifty per cent and receipt it in full, I will pay you now and have it over with.' 'No,' said I, 'that is not my style of doing business. I will have the whole face of the bill or not a cent. If you won't pay it like a man I will sell the account to your brother and let him collect it.' 'Oh,' said he, 'don't do that; he will bother the life out of me. I am pretty busy this morning. Let it lie for ten days more, and I will see about it then. Good morning.' So I left him, utterly disgusted. I thought to myself, old Jah, when you want me to do another job for you, you will pay in advance or no services will be rendered."

"Ha! ha! ha!" laughed I, "the owner of 'a thousand hills' is slow pay indeed! But you have a good security. If Jahveh don't pay you Lucifer will. I guess you are all right. But look here, I want to ask you a question or two just for information. How rapidly do you travel when on your journeys?"

"I go as quick as thought. You see I am nothing but thought—pure human imagination. It is the same with all of us gods; we are simply the imaginations of men. If all the gods in the whole of god-dom were simmered and boiled down into one they would not make five-eighths of

Chancellor Haven's Questions about Taxing Church Property.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: About a month ago I addressed the following letter to the Rev. L. W. Stratton, A. M., editor of the American Wesleyan, for publication. It is self-explaining, and has not been published or returned as requested:

To the Editor of the American Wesleyan, Dear Sir: Having seen a lengthy editorial article in your paper referring to the taxation of church property, by Chancellor Haven, in which he asks some questions, I respectfully venture to reply. The questions are as follows:

1. Who has petitioned for it?
2. What class of people favors it?
3. Would the people hav any less taxes to pay?
4. Does a single man, woman, or child who has contributed to keep them in repair obtain one cent of pecuniary profit from them?
5. If a few persons join hands and buy a park and giv it to the public, and keep it in good condition, will the state tax the donors and their successors forever for their benevolence?
7. Is he not protected in so doing?
8. Monuments hav been erected in our cemeteries to commemorate the dead. Are they not protected?
9. Why draw a line anywhere?
10. Do the counties want it? Not a board of supervisors, so far as I know, has as yet asked for the privilege. The townships? What township? What village?

In reply to the first and second questions I will tell him that they are the people who realize that equal justice for all and partiality to none is a very equitable rule of conduct. Those that can distinguish essential and tangible difference between public-spiritedness and public plundering and systematic robbery, whether authorized by discriminating laws or otherwise. Those that are opposed to burdening the widows, orphans, the infirm and the destitute, the decrepit, suffering for the necessaries of life, to make amends for favors and privileges enjoyed by wealthy church societies and opulent ecclesiastical institutions. They think hell can be avoided in the future without resorting to those extortionary methods of raising hell in the present. Men who consider practical utility of as much importance as theological theories or arbitrary and superstitious speculations. People who do not think they hav lost much by not living when John Wesley was denouncing the efforts of the Americans to make themselves independent of British tyranny. Or when Calvin instigated the burning of Servetus, and Luther and Melancthon wrote approving letters of the cold-blooded, murderous outrage. People that do not feel misplaced and misdated because they did not liv when Christian governments recognized the Inquisition to be a divine and sacred institution; or when the English Protestants punished Catholics with death for saying mass, and went in for a wholesale persecution of the Nonconformists; or when Protestants drove the Puritans out of old England, and the Puritans drove the peaceful Quakers out of New England. They are the people that do not advocate the improvement of this world as a method of laying up treasures in another. They are not so godly that they plunder the godless to pay for their godliness. They were born right the first time, and hav not got to submit themselves to the humiliation of a repetition to distinguish between right and wrong. They do not make morality secondary to some form of belief; they do not discourage and belittle morality by making out it will not save anyone and some sort of belief will. Their morality has a self-contained stability, and can stand alone without divine bribes or devilish threats.

3. The state requires a certain sum to protect the property within its borders. It is axiomatic that the rate will increase just in proportion that the assessment is decreased by exemptions. Otherwise, if exemption makes no difference, why not exempt everything?

4. There may not be any pecuniary revenue where the pews are not rented out and no gambling enterprises are carried on, and still be other benefits and comforts that are a real enjoyment and profit. A dwelling-house yields no pecuniary revenue to its owner occupant. Still there are other benefits that make its possession desirable and just as necessary as a church. Do not churches and dwellings actually save a pecuniary outlay that would be expended if they were not already possessed? If churches and dwellings return no benefit, pecuniary or otherwise, why are they built? Should they not be taxed to prevent a useless waste if they do not? If they do, why should they be favored at the expense of other property?

5. If it is actually given and officially taken by the proper public authorities there would be no use of taxation, for it would be putting the authorities to an expense payable by the whole public, who already own it and control it through their official representatives, the same as they do the highways, canals, public buildings, etc. But if it is held by the trustees of a voluntary corporation that controls and manages it entirely independent of the rest of the public officially represented, or by a congregational clique or a denominational ring inside of a congregational ring who can prevent its general use by the general public or their authorized officials at their own discretion, then it should be taxed the same as a bank, hotel, railroad, or any semi-public institution controlled by individuals or voluntary associations.

6. The right he has now. Chancellor Haven or anybody else that is possessed of ordinary information knows that no one has to get a license or pay a tax for exercising the prerogative of benevolence. If a parent has property it is taxed. If he is benevolent enough to giv it to his children the property is still taxed while they or their successors hav it—the mere act of benevolence is not. And if he is benevolent enough to giv his property to encourage the building of a railroad, grist mill, cheese factory, theater, hotel, or other semi-public institution—except a church—that is directed by individuals or corporations other than the authorized officials of the whole public, the property is justly and rightfully taxed; or, as Chancellor Haven is pleased to misrepresent it, compelled to pay an annual fine and penalty for their benevolence.

7. Of course he is. He ought to be. Would you stop it or restrict benevolence to giving to churches?

8. Is the church a mental and intellectual sepulcher for the living the same as a graveyard is for the dead? If not, where is the force of the comparison and the parallel in the case? The argument that an institution adopting the laws, records, and annals, or whole literature of a savage and barbarous nation like the ancient Hebrews as the criterion of the enlightened present, and infallible guide of the progressive future, is dead to all advancement, and therefore an intellectual sepulcher and mental burial place, is the most truthful, consistent, and logical reason yet given for exemption. I did not expect that plea or a parallel to that effect. I confess that I am opposed to compulsory means for controlling destinies beyond the mental or material grave. Still, if the comparison is a parallel of fact, I doubt the wisdom of pensioning them in a pecuniary and physical way by tax exemptions, for it is claimed and admitted that they are physically and pecuniarily alive. They should be aided or subsidized morally and intellectually, for it is the ethical death that beseeches solemnity.

9. Because some institutions are public ones in reality and fact, like the highways and public schools, while others are not, although they may hav public features, like a circus, church, hotel, or theater.

10. Boards of supervisors are, as a rule, too busy spending the people's money to take any great interest in matters that devolve upon other branches of the government. Does the Legislature generally wait for the boards of supervisors to tell them what to do? Would our memories hav to run backwards more than a second to find a time when there were numerous evils a board of supervisors never asked to hav righted? The townships and villages are those that want law to be a medium for the equal diffusion of justice, instead of a mere guise and subterfuge by virtue of which one class of persons and corporations can rob and plunder their luckless victims to gorge their own selfishness.

The Chancellor's statements hav a similar import to his questions, and the reply to them is sufficient for the statements. They are based on the following principles and premises:

1. A voluntary church association is the public.
2. Any other voluntary association is not the public.
3. Because the church is a good thing is a reason it should not be taxed.
4. Because anything else is a good thing is a reason it should be taxed.
5. What the church pays government for its protection is a penalty and fine.
6. What anything else pays government for its protection is simply a tax.
7. Because the church directly or indirectly benefits the community is a reason it should not be taxed.
8. Because anything else directly or indirectly benefits the community is a reason it should be taxed.
9. The church is no pecuniary benefit to anybody, therefore it is a great pecuniary benefit to everybody.
10. The church only benefits the government, but the government is extravagant and a nuisance to everybody.
11. Because the church improves the looks and appearance of a place is a reason it should not be taxed.
12. Because anything else improves the looks and appearance of a place is a reason it should be taxed.
13. "In public and semi-public things we are behind the world," therefore the public should be taxed to put America on a par with Europe, and, if possible, make it as desirable a place for the industrial and producing classes to get away from as Europe is already.
14. Amen. So be it forevermore. Glory hallelujah.

Great stress is put on the fact that "some of our states actually offer a bounty for setting out trees by the roadside." He concludes, "tax every tree and you may succeed in getting the most of them cut down and no more set out." If the churches are as public as the streets, the comparison is effective. Col. Ingersoll can drive, walk, talk, or express his opinions without any restraint by any church organization on the public streets. Can he and half of the community do so in the churches? Thomas Paine was a hero and made great personal and pecuniary efforts to secure American independence; so much so that Congress saw fit to reward him with $3,000, the Legislature of Pennsylvania with £500, and the state of New York gave him a house and a farm of three hundred acres at New Rochelle. John Wesley, the founder of Methodism and namesake of the Wesleyan church, was a malevolent foe of American freedom. He preached sermons advocating the British oppressions and published an abridgement of Dr. Johnson's pamphlet—who said, "The Americans are a race of convicts and ought to be thankful for anything we allow them short of hanging"—at the low price of one penny to giv it a wider circulation and more influence. Are the churches free for those that wish to honor the apostle of freedom or only for those that honor the apostle of tyranny? The streets are alike free to both. The student of science and the slave of superstition hav equal rights there.

Being sincerely desirous to do what is right, fair, and equitable in regard to the taxation of church property, and trusting that you and the readers of your paper are equally as much so, I respectfully make the proposition that you open the columns of your paper for a discussion of the question, so that we can get all sides of the case fairly and truthfully presented and acknowledge our mistakes when they are demonstrated; and, furthermore, I cheerfully and respectfully challenge Chancellor Haven, the editor of the Wesleyan, or any one they may wish to substitute, to debate the question, providing you accept the proposition, by each writing an article of equal length each alternate week in support of their view of the matter. If you accept the challenge and proposition, please inform me immediately, if not, please be so kind as to return this letter. If you publish any part, please publish the whole letter, for I will not be responsible for any extracts away from their connections; it will only be fair, for your readers hav had the Chancellor's side in full. If you do not publish any part of it, I shall be pleased to receive any views you may hav upon the subject by letter, for I wish to rightly understand the subject. Yours with respect, etc., B. F. Babbitt,

Creation Briefly Considered.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Any cause having its foundation in truth cannot be injured by free and fair discussion. "Let us reason together," with full confidence that nothing really worth preserving will be lost.

The remarkable hold that the Bible account of creation has had upon the minds of men for upwards of three thousand years entitles it to respectful consideration. Yet when plenary inspiration is claimed for any writing, the unbiased thinker ought not to hesitate to apply the severest tests, in order to determine its historical or scientific accuracy. If the claim is well founded of course no defects can be pointed out.

The old receipe for cooking a hare began, "First catch the hare." First take the Bible from the shelf, wipe off the dust, open to Genesis i, and read: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters."

In the beginning of what? As the sun, moon, and stars had not then been created, it must hav been the very beginning of the universe, and the first act was the creation of this tiny earth and its heaven or sky. The starry heavens were not meant by the word heaven, for, according to the account, they did not then exist. Making the earth before the sun was like first making a chimney and then building the house.

Science has demonstrated, or made it reasonably certain, that worlds succeed worlds in the boundless expanse of space, condensing, evolving from nebulous matter, progressing, culminating, then declining, dying; the material of which they were formed changing into new combinations. The whole process may be likened to the growth and decay of the trees in the forest. Younger worlds take the place of the old, as younger trees replace the dead giants of the forest. Systems of suns and planets succeed other systems, and throughout all the changes, occupying countless millions of ages, not a particle of matter is destroyed.

Go out from the earth in any direction until you reach an imaginary boundary of space, and ask yourself what lies beyond this boundary. Reason and analogy answer, Space with its vital matter, like the known paths already traversed. Take a voyage back in time, go through the hundreds of millions of years while sedimentary rocks were forming; note the slowly passing ages during which the earth was condensing from nebulous matter; consider the millions of ages the nebulous mass of the solar system was condensing before the earth was left behind as a nebulous ring by the cooling central mass; go back through billions of such formations of world clusters, fix in your mind the moment of beginning, and ask yourself what there was before. The irresistible conclusion is reached that the universe has no limit; that time, space, and matter with its potencies, had no beginning. There has been no creation, but a continual change. The creative energy of to-day is the same as it was a billion years ago. Nothing has been added to the extent, the matter, or the forces of the universe.

The earth never was "without form, and void." When it became separated from the condensing solar mass it was no more without form than are the rings of Saturn. We hav in the Saturnian system, on a smaller scale, the then condition of the solar system. Neither was the earth then void, for in every atom it felt the quickening power of all the forces of nature—a universal life as indestructible, as uncreatable as matter, because it is a property of matter. All the forms of life that hav since then developed upon its surface were at that time existing in its atoms and in other forms of force.

Darkness was not "upon the face of the deep," for long before the earth had cooled sufficiently for seas to form from the condensed aqueous vapor the glowing mass of the sun was flooding the world with light. The sun and the stars gave forth their light and life long before the "spirit of God," or the wind, "moved upon the face of the waters."

"And God said, Let there be light, and there was light. And God saw the light, that it was good; and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light day, and the darkness he called night. And the evening and the morning were the first day."

Primary matter, while hot and condensing into a habitable globe, gives forth light, and light must be considered a property of matter, and not capable of being separately created. We are left in ignorance of the source of this light that marked the division of day and night three or four days before the sun was created.

"And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament; and it was so. And the evening and the morning were the second day."

We hav here to deal with the ancient idea of a system of solid crystal spheres, a little way up in the sky, in which sun, moon, and stars are set, and by which they are carried along. These spheres not only supported and moved the sun, moon, planets, and fixed stars, but served also to hold up the waters until providence should see fit to "open the windows of the heaven," and let the rain "fall alike upon the just and the unjust." And this firmament or crystal expanse was the heaven, and needed not to be very strong, for the stars were small and light and the angels up there were light and shadowy also. For thousands of years the imaginary beings enthroned upon or above that imaginary sphere controlled the destinies of nations, sent at will the rain or the famine and pestilence, and were swayed one way and another by the prayers of their earthly favorites. The firmament was a sort of appendix to the earth, so near the ground that men tried to build a tower to reach it, and the Lord came down to see the tower, and he put a stop to the work because he feared that nothing would be "restrained from them, which they had imagined to do." It was very fortunate for theology that the Lord found out what was going on before it was too late, for with the chasm between earth and heaven bridged, there would hav been no need of paying mediators.

Omitting the ninth and tenth verses of this interesting chapter about gathering together seas, we proceed to quote: "And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself upon the earth, and it was so. And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind, and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the third day."

About the third day's work it may be said, first, that it does not correspond with the order of creation, for, according to this, vegetables preceded animals by two days. Now, the oldest fossil yet found is the eozoan canadense, and it is animal. If in spite of the fact that the Hebrew word yom means day, and is so interpreted in the seventh day, or Sabbath, we are to presume that it means about one-sixth of the time that has elapsed since "the beginning" of the earth, the criticism still holds good. In that case Genesis would place the highest as well as the lowest plants 100,000,000 years—be the same more or less—before the creation of any animals. Second, geology proves that animals and plants hav developed through many millions of years side by side from the lowest forms, the highest types of each only being reached in the latest or present geological period. Genesis creates fruit-trees and all the lower types of vegetation at the same time, giving to one day the work that geology spreads out through nearly or quite all ~~sedimentary rocks, a period of probably at least~~ 300,000,000 years. And this argument applies with at least equal force to the creation of animals. Third, the sun was not made until the fourth day. Making plants before the sun was created is certainly peculiar, and the peculiarity is still more striking if we suppose plants grew and developed from algæ to fruit-trees through a period of many millions of years without sunlight.

"And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and for years. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to giv light upon the earth, and it was so. And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; he made the stars also. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to giv light upon the earth, and to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness; and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the fourth day."

Here we hav strong expressions favorable to the idea that the author of this chapter believed the sun, moon, and stars were small bright bodies set in solid spheres for the principal purpose of giving light on the earth and serving the convenience of pigmy man. Nowhere is there a hint of the vastly higher purpose of supporting their own inhabitants; nowhere a realization of the comparative insignificance of this earth and its inhabitants. So far from this, the phrase, "He made the stars also," seems to be thrown in almost as an afterthought—a matter of small account. More important in the economy of the universe than all that come within the range of our unaided vision are the nebulæ, and they are entirely overlooked by the author of Genesis. Contrast this with the proud expression, "And God created great whales." The author evidently looked upon whales as much more important than stars.

An inspired author never could hav called attention to the stars being useful as "signs" and overlooked their infinite numbers, magnitude, and cosmical importance. An inspired writer never could hav claimed that the stars were created after the earth was made and even clothed with vegetation.

Again, four days, or, according to the apologists, four periods, two-thirds of the time from the beginning to man, hav passed away, one-half since fruit trees were made, and still not even the lowest animal has made its appearance. The eozoon of the Laurentian rock has not yet come. The long chain of progressive organisms, from the amœba to man, has yet to be developed, and only two days remain. How absurd to say that this story agrees with science!

On the fifth day came the "great whales," and the fish, and the "fowls of the air." And in defiance of the records of the rocks, as plainly read by the paleontologist, the "cattle, beasts, and everything that creepeth upon the earth," were not created until the sixth period. They were created in a lump at that, instead of being developed through many millions of years, and a gradation of forms lineally connected, as the rock-leaves of the great earth-book demonstrate.

"And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them hav dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them."

He then blessed them, pronounced everything very good, and it was the sixth day. By the way, it was not long before he thought it very bad, and repented that he had made man.

The question whether or not man is in the image of an all pervading natural power or force, correlated to all other forces, we do not care to discuss. That he, like the horse, has developed through a process of natural selection, from the lower forms of animal life, is conceded by a large majority of those scientific men who by reason of the most thorough investigation hav best fitted themselves to judge. Instead of being created he has developed. Instead of being placed in the Garden of Eden less than six thousand years ago, it is in evidence that he lived on the earth as the contemporary of a number of extinct species of animals. The geological evidence is already of such a character as to make it reasonably certain that he has inhabited the earth for hundreds of thousands of years.

Historical and archæological evidence goes to discredit scriptural chronology. All evidence shows that the first men were low in the scale instead of being "very good" and perfect. The newly discovered facts enable us to believe in the rise instead of the fall of man; in his salvation through the laws of nature instead of through faith.

It will be noticed that God refers to himself in the plural number—"our image," "our likeness." The explanation is that throughout this chapter, and in the first three verses of the second chapter, the plural Hebrew word Elohim is translated into the singular, God. Were the authors of the book of Genesis polytheists?

"And the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made."

Thus far the Deity is called Elohim, translated God, and with this verse the Elohistic account of creation ends. The next verse begins the second or Yahvistic account of creation, and here we hav Yahveh Elohim, translated Lord God. It would seem that if the same author wrote both stories he must hav received his inspiration from at least two different sources.

Yes, indeed, that little glass heaven is "finished," but are the real heavens and earth finished? Is the work ended? Is nature's great hive at rest? No, the activity is as great as ever. The "clash of atoms and the rush of worlds" still continues. All the "creation" that ever was is still going on. No rest, even on the seventh day. A liberal reward offered for any plant or animal in a state of nature resting every seventh day would never be called for. Night is the only time for the natural repose of living organisms. The forces of the universe never tire, never need to rest from their work.

In the second account of the creation, beginning with the fourth verse of the second chapter of Genesis, the work is not divided into days, nor is the total time taken for the job given. According to the first myth—for we must in truth call it that—man was made last of all, and made male and female. According to the second myth, man was made before and woman not until after the creation of the lower animals. Does such an error or contradiction look like plenary inspiration?

Adam named "every living creature." He must hav been a good linguist, a fast worker with the microscope, and he must hav "lived long in the land." What a pity that Providence has not preserved his list of names! It would hav saved several generations of naturalists a world of trouble.

Adam was in many respects a very wonderful man. One little half-pound rib out of his precious carcass was amply sufficient to make a perfect woman, without any special exercise of creative power. How is it possible for educated woman, in this age of scientific awakening, to believe this absurd and ignoble story of her origin? How is it possible for her to think for a moment that such a fable is the very word of that divine power which determines the channels of development of countless systems of habitable worlds?

There is, there can be, no known exception to the rule that "the universe is governed by law." Man, in his origin, or social relations, is but an atom in the universe, moved and controlled by the inexorable laws of that living matter of which he is but an insignificant part. Let us cease to teach our children decaying superstitions. Let us lead them to nature's truthful fountain, that their lives may be passed without hypocrisy, and the future of our race be made bright with hope.

"Predespernation."

An old-time Baptist preacher of this city who has retired from active gospel work, but who still keeps a firm eye on the faith, has just had a little experience with a colored man that causes him to think very seriously. Meeting the colored man the preacher said:

"Dave, if you don't bring that saddle home I'll hav you put in jail."

"What saddle yer ferren ter?"

"The one you stole from me."

"Parson, 'fore de Lord, I nebber stole yer saddle."

"Yes you did. I saw you when you took it off of the fence. I believe I'll hav you arrested, anyway."

"Look heah, parson, you'es a old Babtist, isn't yer?"

"Yes, and I'll hav you sent to the penitentiary."

"Well, so is I, an' now ketch de pints ez I gin 'em ter yer. Dar is jes' so many saddles in dis worl' what is ter be stole, an' dar's jes so many men what is ter steal dese saddles. Dis is predespernation. Now, ef yer saddle happens ter be one ob de predisposed saddles an' I happens ter be one ob de predisposed men, kin I hep it? Dar wus Judus, fur instance. He couldn't help 'trayin' de savior, kase de savior said: 'Judas, sop in dis dish an' go an 'tray me.' Hit wasn't Judas's fault, kase he was one ob de predisposed, so 'tended from de foundation ob de worl'."

"I don't want a religious discussion, Dave. It isn't the saddle now that I care so much about; it is that you told me a lie in saying that you didn't steal it."

"Well, den, parson, 'spose I takes back de lie an' keeps de saddle."

"A lie once told always stands. You hav lied to me, you scoundrel, and I believe it is my duty to hav you arrested."

"Parson, dar's a certain amount ob lies ter be tole in dis worl', an' ef I is one ob de men what is predisposed ter tell one ob dese lies, hit's not my fault, an' I can't help hit."

"You go on now and get that saddle, or I'll swear out a warrant for your arrest."

"I'll do de bes' I kin, parson, but dar's jes a certain 'mount of stole saddles ter be returned in dis worl'. Ef I'se one of de predisposed men, an' I b'lieves I is, you'll fine yer saddle hangin' on de ya'd fence 'bout sundown dis ebening'."

Liberal Elections in Farley, Iowa.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On the first Monday of this month we held our municipal election. Among the officers to be elected were two councilmen, and two well-known Freethinkers were put upon the ticket. Some of the leaders of orthodoxy got wonderfully excited and called another caucus and brought out new candidates. One prominent lawyer, who is also a church member, said that if the town was going to be run by Ingersollism he would leave it. He approached one of the "Ingersoll" candidates and said to him, "You are a good, square man, truthful, honest, and I would take your word as quick as I would that of any man in town; but you are a G—d d—n Ingersollite and ought to be burned. I could chain you to a stake, pile the fagots around you, pour on coal oil, set it on fire, and then stand by and see you burn with pleasure. G—d d—n you, if Ingersoll is going to run this town through you, I will leave it. You shall not be elected if I can help it."

He said much more to the same effect. The "Ingersollite" told him that he (the lawyer) had the same fault that many other Christians had, to wit, "That he swore too much when he got drunk."

With our orthodox friends worked hard and rallied all the force they could; but when the ballots were counted the "Ingersollites" were found to be ahead, and were therefore declared elected. There are quite a number of "sore heads" about town, but they can do no better than hold their peace. Orthodoxy feels badly whipped, and the "Ingersollites" are jubilant. "Let joy be unconfined!"

In our school election, held on the second Monday of this month, we put two Freethinkers on the ticket for trustees. We had a well attended caucus, and nominated a ticket which seemed to meet with universal approval. About nine o'clock on the morning of election day the Catholics, who are quite numerous here, brought a new ticket into the field, which, if elected, would giv them control of our public school. After participating with us in our public caucus, they had held a private one, and hoped by taking us unawares to elect their men. The news of the dirty, cowardly act flew like fire all over the district. Runners were sent in every direction. Every man was got to the polls that could be found. The contest was hot until the last available man was in. We got our last vote in just five minutes before closing. When the ballots were counted it was found we were seventeen ahead. The Catholic element went away somewhat crestfallen; they felt as though they had sprung a trap and caught themselves. What made the affair look so cursedly mean was that their representative man was chosen secretary of the public caucus, and was also appointed chairman of a committee to present names for nomination, and was one of the leading spirits in the public move. He then "went back" on the action of the caucus and tried hard to defeat the ticket he had helped to make. He sold himself out, and will probably get three annual instalments of defeat in return. I hav heard that the Catholics hav played similar tricks in other parts of the state, and in some cases were successful. They are after the free schools with a sharp stick, and will destroy them if they can.

Now comes the more pleasant part of this communication. I herewith send you the names of two new subscribers with cash for the same, also money to pay for my subscription for another year, and one copy of Bro. Bennett's last book, "Ancient Gods and Ancient Religions." I hav mailed my last six TRUTH SEEKERS to one person, hoping to cause him to subscribe for it. I shall mail my next six to some one else for the same purpose. We must work for the wide circulation of Liberal papers. I hav been the recipient of several numbers of the Seymour Times, Boston Investigator, Mind and Matter, Word, Western Liberal, and other papers, for which I thank the senders, I shall put them all where I hope they may do some good. I shall look for subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in all my travels about the country. I want to see its list reach 100,000. To that end let us all work. Yours ever, H. GILMORE.

a pennyweight of real matter or substance. You see there is nothing of us and nothing prevents us, so we can go just as fast as we please. But, true, I have had the name of being very fleet, and when one gets his name up, you know, his fortune is made. I can't really go any faster than some of the other gods, though I get the credit of it. The fact is, Bennett, we don't go at all, nor do we exist at all. We have not the substance of an ordinary shadow."

"Well, I must say, Mercury, I have had about that opinion for a good while, and am prepared to accept the truth of what you say. Gods are a production of the human brain and never have existed anywhere else. But tell me, don't you in your travels sometimes meet Jesus, the reputed son of Jahveh? As you are darting around in all parts of the celestial regions I presume you sometimes fall into company with him."

"Yes, yes, I have met him several times, and he is a very pleasant, genial sort of person. Sometimes we have had long chats together. I find him very agreeable. I met him once soon after the convention and he spoke to me about it and he also made some remarks about you?"

"Indeed! you surprise me! I will be very glad to hear what he had to say of the convention and of myself."

"Well, he thought that convention was an ill-advised, needless, useless affair. He said it was difficult for him to understand what Jahveh expected to accomplish by getting all the old myths together, just to show his own spleen, with the expectation that he would get them to co-operate with him to do some violence to that TRUTH SEEKER man.

"'It is time,' said Jesus, 'that he learned better. He used to frighten his little handful of chosen people among the hills of Judea when he talked about his thunder and his wrath, but he ought not to expect people to be longer frightened in that way. Had he asked my advice about the convention to get the gods together for the purpose of preventing the writing of a book about themselves and their religions, I should have given my advice against it. I have had my eye on that TRUTH SEEKER man for some time, and I think he has been badly treated. The people who falsely call themselves my followers and lovers of me have acted very shabbily toward him. Their treatment, which they have even claimed to have performed to please me and those in my service, has been unworthy of honorable and merciful men. I verily think he is a better man to-day than those who have so persistently persecuted him. If he wants to write a book, or half a dozen of them, he has a perfect right to do so; and I was sorry that Jahveh, who has so often been called my father, should take the steps he did in opposition to a proper and legitimate enterprise. I am in favor of equal rights for all men and women, and I utterly detest every movement that is instituted to deprive them of it.'"

"Good for Jesus," said I. "His talk has the right sort of ring. He is the man for my money, and I shall have to raise my opinion of him. What else did he have to say?"

"Oh, he said a great deal more than I can take the time to repeat to you now; but let me assure you that he is a person of very good common sense, with a small proportion of nonsense about him. As you are anxious to hear what his remarks were I will give you some of them with pleasure, and nearly in his own words. We talked considerably about the gods. He said:

"'It is surprising how very far from the truth mankind have been upon this subject. Instead of accepting as original and eternal all that is in sight, and all that exists, they have for thousands of years been cudgeling their brains and inventing invisible and impossible gods, to whom they attributed the power to create that which is a thousand times superior to themselves. How absurd for men to believe that a puny god of their own formation could be capable of creating unlimited space and infinite matter to fill it, with all the potencies, forces, and powers inseparably connected with it, and, too, when a million such gods combined could not equal in force the smallest globe in the entire universe!—no, not even a small-sized aerolite or meteor, which often flies through or into the atmospheres of the various orbs that revolve in space! The fact is, the universe comprehends all that exists and all that ever did exist, while the gods may be said to comprehend all that never did exist and never can exist. It is a misfortune that the human mind is so constituted as to be ever imagining and divining myths wholly outside of existence and reality. One only has to cast his eyes over the past few thousand years to realize what a sad muddle man has made of his god-making, and how much it has cost him to sustain them and keep them up. What absurd systems of religion, too, have been concocted upon the basis of these mistaken beliefs! The world has been filled with these monstrous errors. Man has been made unhappy by them. Wretchedness, superstition, and ignorance have been the outgrowth of these errors, and man has thus been the unfortunate victim of his own fears and follies. He has created gods to tyrannize over him; he has devised devils to torment him; he has made hells to cause agony to himself, and thus he has made the fair earth a perfect pandemonium of misery and suffering, when, on the other hand, it might have been a lovely paradise, a heaven of rational enjoyment, a continued bliss. Yes, in this way the world has been filled with contentions, quarrels, wars, and terrible bloodshed. The worshipers of one god have waged war against the worshipers of some other god, and each have tried to their utmost to exterminate their opponents. Men have thus become deadly enemies to each other when they should have remained friends and brothers. They have spilt each others' blood, mutilated each other's bodies, and made corpses of millions of their fellow-beings while madly following the monsters of their own creation, and have made perfect demons of themselves. Yes, the worship of gods has made devils of men. Their religions have been far worse than the worst sacrilege and blasphemy; in fact, under some of these systems of religion, where the great boast of its devotees has been to render allegiance to an invisible god somewhere above the clouds, the most monstrous crimes have been committed, the most merciless cruelties have been perpetrated, the most agonizing tortures have been inflicted, the most terrible deaths have been produced, and in numbers far beyond the computation of any living being. Yes, in the name of religion men have become fiends incarnate. This is, alas, too true! too true! And I am grieved to say, also, that the worst of all—yes, by far the worst of all—has been the hellish work of those who have pretended to be followers of myself; who never wished harm upon the humblest individual that ever lived, or even purposely placed my foot upon a worm, or caused pain to the smallest form of animal life. I tell you, Mercury, it makes my heart sick to look over the face of the earth for the last fifteen hundred years and view what wickedness, what a vast aggregate of positive misery and torture, what seas of human blood have been shed in my name! Other gods have had their sacrifices of thousands of bullocks, heifers, goats, and sheep, as well as thousands of human beings also, but all those may be counted as nothing when the general aggregate is made up or approximated to of the millions of hapless beings who have been tortured and slaughtered in my name, and who have been sacrificed at my shrines. Many and many a time have I wondered what I ever said or did that could give the least warrant for my mistaken followers to pursue such a course and to be guilty of such horrible deeds. Did I ever set such an example? Did I ever recommend such devilish cruelties? Did I ever, by the slightest word or action, inculcate savage barbarity and cruelty? Thousands of times, in view of all these monstrous deeds that have been committed in my name, have I fervently regretted that I ever had an existence? Deeply have I regretted that men ever heard of my name, in which to perform such fiendish deeds. Sorrowful has it made me, thousands of times, to know that my name, my axioms, my teachings, and my life should become the pretext or incentive for such diabolical crimes. How often have worthy men been torn from their beloved families never to cast eyes upon them again, and hurled into noisome dungeons, stretched upon racks and machines as relentless as their operators, until joint after joint was dislocated and torn open, until bone after bone was broken, burning splinters of pitch thrust into their flesh, boiling oil poured into their ears, their eyes gouged out, their tongues torn out by the roots, and much more too horrible to relate, until death come to their relief! How often have delicate and sensitive females, many times far on the way to maternity, been seized in the foul grasp of a loathsome villain, torn from the loved family circle, thrown into terrible prisons, subjected to the tortures just named, or their bowels let out with ripping-knives, and every conceivable indignity and cruelty perpetrated upon them! How welcome death has been to thousands of such poor wretches after pious devils had exhausted their ingenuity to devise ways to inflict pain and torture upon them! How often have the children of such persecuted parents—yes, even infants and suckling babes—been seized by the heels and their brains dashed out in the very sight of their agonized parents and relatives! Oh, it makes one's blood boil with fierce indignation to realize a tithe of what has been done in this way!—yes, done in the name of the religion of Jesus, the meek and lowly one!'"

"Why, Mercury," interposed I, "can it be possible that Jesus talked in that way, he whom the Christian church appeal to so sanctimoniously as authority for all the mental and bodily sufferings they have caused and are still causing to their fellow-beings? It does me good to hear that he is capable of uttering such words of burning truth. It is truer, if not more beautiful, than his celebrated 'Sermon on the Mount.' I can listen to you all night if you repeat from him such words as those. I am more than glad to know that he takes such a truthful view of the terrible enormities that during fifteen centuries have been committed in his name. Did he say more, good Mercury?"

"Oh, yes, he said much more—a good deal that I cannot remember well enough to repeat accurately, but much that I can. I remember distinctly one remark he made in connection with the foregoing, and it was to this effect, that it pained him excessively that the millions who believe him possessed of deific power should necessarily have the reflection that he would tamely and quietly remain in heaven pleasantly seated on the Great White Throne and with stoic indifference while all these crimes and cruelties were being perpetrated, and never lift a finger to stay the flood of carnage nor say a word to check the long-continued work of torture and death. Said he: 'It hurts me to think that any sensible, humane person could think me so indifferent and heartless—possessing, as they think, almighty power—as to let this most infernal business be continued week after week, month after month, year after year, and century after century, and I make no effort to stop it. This has made me sad time and time again. How gladly would I have put a stop to all this cruelty and death had I the power to do so. Had I the hundredth part of the might which the Christian world believes that I possess, this state of things never would have existed. Yes, had I the power ascribed to an ordinary sixth-rate god, millions who died in excruciating torture would not have met the fate they did; mothers with infants at the breast, or yet unborn, would not have suffered cruelties too severe for murderers and despots. Had I even but moderate power, human blood would not have flowed in rivers in the name of my religion or in any other name. I would have nipped it even in the bud. I would have squelched it at the very inception. Never should such human agony have been experienced; never such mental anguish suffered; never such inexpressible torment endured. But alas! I have not the power that deluded mortals think I have; I possess not the might they accord me; I am not the god they think me.' When he spoke these words he sighed deeply and looked the very picture of unhappiness and regret. I wished to cheer him up a little, and said: 'Well, Jesus, do not feel unhappy about it. As you cannot help it, it is useless for you to mourn over it. You certainly are not responsible for the bad acts of those who have professed to be your followers. You never set any such example; you never taught any such deeds to be performed; you never incited any such base conduct.' 'That is very true,' said he; 'so far as that is concerned my conscience is clear. I never taught nor encouraged nor recognized anything of the kind. I was mistaken in many of the views I entertained during my earthly career. I was an enthusiast and entertained the best of motives, but my knowledge was limited, my zeal was ill-advised, and my opinions were many of them based upon a false foundation. This much I can say in truth, I meant no harm to any one. I sought to mislead not my followers, and I wished not by word or deed to make one human being less happy. But let me tell you a great mischief has been done by ascribing to me things that I never did and words that I never uttered. I have often been overwhelmed with surprise that such impositions could be practiced in the name of religion and morality. I assuredly never thought I was God or even the son of a god. I never said such a word, nor imparted such a thought. Those things were all ascribed to me by designing persons long after I had passed out of existence.' The story about my marvelous parentage, about my being begotten by an invisible god or ghost, is the merest fable that was ever concocted in the brain of man. There is no earthly foundation for such an idle tale, and it is a marvel to me how sensible people can give credence to such impossible nonsense as to think a human being was ever begotten without a natural father. How singular it is that people with the least intelligence will believe such idle tales! That miraculous paternity on my part was not claimed neither by myself nor anybody else during my lifetime; it was an afterthought on the part of those most zealous in building up a system of religion in my humble name. The idea was borrowed from pagan mythology and woven into my story in a bungling and perfectly incredible manner.'

"'There are many other things written of me in the "four gospels," as they are called, which I did not say or do, and never authorized anybody to write for me. I never raised a man nor woman from the dead, nor did any one else ever perform such an impossible deed. A person may appear to be dead from various causes, and afterwards they may revive and be perfectly restored to their normal condition. Animation may be temporarily suspended from fainting, certain diseases of the heart, from suffocation, heavy blows, stoppage of circulation, apoplexy, catalepsy, partial drowning, etc., and by proper means, or even by an effort of nature, they may entirely recover, but not one person who really died, and all animation ceased, was ever brought back to life. How excessively absurd, then, to write and print of me that I raised Lazarus from the dead after he had become so far decayed as to smell offensively. Persons who can give credence to such extravagant statements would swallow all of Baron Munchausen's wildest falsehoods and even the Baron himself could they have a chance to do so. I was magnetic enough to perform some cures, and to relieve several people troubled with various curable ailments, especially when the imagination was quite as much diseased as the body, but even these were greatly multiplied and exaggerated. After I was dead it was thought that this simple story of my life, deeds, and teachings could be dressed up and embellished so as to make it justifiable to attribute at least fifty per cent of divinity to my parentage, character, and being; but there was no truthful foundation for it. I was superior by nature to the low and coarse, but not superior in any sense of the word to thousands of men and women who have lived in various ages of the world. I was just as human as Buddha, Zoroaster, Confucius, Mencius, Thales, Solon, Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, Epicurus, Aristotle, Cicero, Seneca, Marcus Aurelius, Copernicus, Galileo, Bruno, Kepler, Newton, Spinoza, Descartes, Luther, Calvin, D'Holbach, Diderot, Voltaire, Volney, John Wesley, Whitefield, Priestly, Paine, Murray, Joseph Smith, John Brown, or any other man. We are all divine alike, and all human alike. Some have better organizations than others; some have better executive talent, or mechanical talent, or oratorical ability, or moral qualities than others; some had better pre-natal conditions, sounder and healthier parents, than others, but we all obtain our existence as individuals by precisely the same process. Nature has but one mode in which that kind of business can be performed, and she never will have but one. Men may talk about Buddha's mother being impregnated by a ray of the sun; they may tell of the mother of Christna being "overshadowed" by the god Vishnu; they may narrate fables about the divine paternity of Hercules, Adonis, Perseus, and as many others as they please, but they are all positively false, mere fables to beguile and deceive ignorant and credulous minds. It is just as true that Minerva came from the brain of Jupiter without the aid of a mother as that others and myself came into existence without a natural father. Every human being that ever lived on the earth had both a natural father and mother, and all statements to the contrary are positive falsehoods; and they are worse than simpletons who believe them and are deluded thereby. There are no hybrids between gods and men more than there are hybrids between men and mermaids and mermaids and whales. One idea is equally as consistent as the other.

"'I have often been vexed,' he continued, 'at the untruths that have been told and printed and circulated all over the world as to the words and sentiments I uttered during my earthly life. I will name some of them. I am reported as using these words: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." I never spoke those words. I never gave Peter the keys of heaven, for the very good reason that I had no such keys to dispose of; and had I, I presume there could have been found persons quite as fit to take charge of them as was Peter. A man of such unstable temper, so impetuous, so frail, false, and fallible as Peter showed himself to be, would have been a very improper person in whose hands to place the eternal destiny, the salvation or damnation, of his fellow-men. Any one might see that I could not have said anything about building my church on him, because I then had no church. I contemplated no church, and the word church was not then in use, nor for many years after that time.

"'Again, I am reported as saying, "That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of the righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar." I could not have used this language, because the Zacharias alluded to in the quotation did not live till thirty-five years after my death. Here again are words put into my mouth which I did not speak, "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." I did not speak those words. I enjoined no preaching of my doctrines to all nations of the earth. I did not prescribe that form of baptism or any other. I cared very little for any kind of baptism. I knew nothing about any Holy Ghost, and said nothing about any at that or any other time. I never taught the doctrine of the Trinity, for I knew nothing about any, and do not to this day. A great deal that is attributed to me about my father and myself, about our being one and the same, is untruthful, as I remarked a while ago. I did not think that Jahveh was my father any more than he was the father of every man in the Jewish nation. I felt a high degree of veneration toward him, being of a very reverential and worshipful organization, but I did not think myself equal to him by any means, nor did I have half as much to say about him as the four narrators represent. These ideas were fixed up, so to speak, long after my death; and my discourses, which at best were not written down for a century after they were spoken, were altered, added to, and falsified in a most dishonest manner. The form of baptism, quoted just now, was borrowed bodily from an ecclesiastical formula not devised till more than a century after my death.

"'Again,' he continued, 'I am represented as predicting my own arrest, trial, execution, and resurrection, in these and similar words: "Behold we go up to Jerusalem; and the son of man shall be betrayed unto the chief priests and unto the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles to mock, and to scourge, and to crucify him; and the third day he shall rise again" I most assuredly did not speak those words or make any such prophecy. I had not the slightest idea that I was so soon to be arrested and executed. I knew not but that I should live many years. If any one will take the trouble to read this pretended explicit prediction over and compare it with the asserted conduct of my disciples after I was arrested, after I was tried, and after I was executed and buried, he must see that if I made such a prediction my followers either did not understand me or did not believe a word I said. If it is true that I foretold so explicitly that I was to be betrayed into the hands of the chief priests and scribes; that I should be condemned, that I should be delivered to the Gentiles to be mocked and scourged, and then to be crucified, three days after which I should rise from the dead, why were my disciples not prepared to see these very events take place in the order I predicted them? How did they conduct themselves? Why, according to the report in the Testament, I had barely uttered the prediction before they commenced talking and wrangling among themselves as to which should be greatest in my temporal kingdom which they believed was about to be established, the respective positions they were to hold in it, etc. It is clear they could not have understood or believed that I was so soon to be arrested and put to death. How did they act when I was arrested? Why, they were disconcerted and surprised. They forsook me and fled. Only a part of them attended my mock trial, and a prominent one who did utterly denied knowing me at all. They did not witness my crucifixion, they did not pay decent attention to my body and provide it with burial; and had it not been for one of the Sanhedrim, Joseph of Arimathea, I might not have been buried at all. Could my disciples have acted in this manner had I told them so explicitly all that was so soon to transpire, and had they believed me? But after the arrest, trial, mocking, scourging, and crucifying had taken place, as it is said I predicted, would they then not have begun to believe I had foretold truly, and looked and provided for my restoration to them, even had they doubted before? The women were more faithful to me than the men; they stood afar off and watched; but if they had really believed the words I am said to have spoken, that after three days I would rise from the dead, would they have purchased spices and brought them to embalm my body? Is it not clear that the idea of a resurrection had not entered their minds and that I had not said anything about it? And when even the women reported to my disciples that I had risen and that my body was no longer in the sepulcher, did they believe it? Does not the account say that they regarded the statements as idle tales? And when some of the disciples were conversing on the road to Emmaus, did they show that they had the least conception of my resurrection? No, my friend, they did not look for it, for the very good reason that I had not said anything to them about it, and for the still better reason that it never took place, and therefore no ascension as is differently described. These things were the inventions of men who wished to get up a marvelous story about myself, to found a system of religion upon. They were not written, nor repeated even, till long after my death. In very mild language, this whole thing was fraudulent. It was false, and the world has been grossly deceived."

"'And again,' Jesus continued, 'I am reported as saying: "For there shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect;" but I did not speak these words. I never taught the doctrine of election. I never believed it, and never used the word elect in the sense that a part were chosen to be saved and a part doomed to eternal damnation. The word did not come into use until after my time. The doctrine was gotten up by others, not myself, and those words were put into my mouth or attributed to me without the slightest authority. It was the same with many other sayings accredited to me. I never said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." Those words never escaped my lips, and it has grieved me sorely that I should be represented as having favored or inculcated the idea that a large portion of the human race will be damned because they did not or could not believe. It is a horrible doctrine. I detest it most heartily and I never was the author of it. Belief follows evidence, and a man cannot believe unless he is convinced. How cruel and unjust, then, to send millions to eternal torture for not believing! How wrong to impute such a doctrine to me. Most assuredly I was not the author of it. Neither did I say, "Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels," nor, "these shall go away into everlasting punishment." It is very untruthful to say I uttered these words. It is most false. Let the pagans have all the honor of devising devils and hells, for I wish none of it. They taught such things more than a thousand years before I came into the world, and I would not, for anything, deprive them of any credit for originality they are justly entitled to. True, my professed followers have made their hell hotter and have put more sulphur into it than the pagans were guilty of, but the idea is essentially pagan, and came from the monstrous conception of angry gods and devils which has so cursed the earth. I heartily wish it had never existed and that even now intelligent beings would abandon it, and believe it no longer. It has caused more unhappiness than all other beliefs that men have harbored; and I, even, am thought to be the inventor and executor of the monstrous creed. Verily I say unto you, I would never send one soul to hell, and I think very little of any god that would.

"'I did not say of those who believe in me, "They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them." A person of sound mind could not think that any form of belief would prevent the effects of the venom of poisonous serpents or other deadly poisons. I certainly was not so unreasonable."

"'There is also,' continued Jesus, 'a great error in attributing to me the prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, of my second appearance on the earth, and the immediate end of the world. I am reported as using such language as this: "Verily, I say unto you, there shall not be left here [the temple] one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down." "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the earth shall be shaken. And there shall appear the son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." "Verily, I say unto you, This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." "There be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom," etc. I did not make any such prediction. If I did so, I proved myself a very false prophet, for with the exception of the city and temple not a word of it has ever been fulfilled, or ever will be. The stars will never fall from their places. As neither of what are called the gospels was written until after the city was taken and the temple destroyed, it was a very easy matter for the writers to make that part of the prediction and the fulfilment agree. At that time an expectation of a near end of the world was rife, as it has been many times since, hence the predictions referred to were put into my mouth. But I repudiate them altogether. Those who wrote that I said so wrote a falsehood. Neither did I command my disciples to sell their garments and buy swords. I did not believe in swords, and was wholly opposed to the bloody business in which they are used. It is a base slander upon my reputation to say I ever advised, or even recognized, the use of the sword, or any other implement for taking human life or inflicting pain. Thus, Mercury, I could go on for hours and point out passage after passage that I am said to have spoken, but which I am no more the author of than yourself, but I will not detain you now. The fact is, I never wrote a word of my public teaching, nor did I authorize any one else to write a word of it, and there was none of it written till more than half a century after my death, and very little then, and very imperfectly at that. All there was for many decades after I left the world were traditions and legends, contradictory and false, as such things always will be among ignorant and superstitious people. There was not a word of what I taught or what I did committed to writing by any of my disciples, or by a person who was an ear or eye witness of what I said and did. In the second and third centuries gospels and epistles were written in profusion. Some truths, of course, were worked in from the traditions and fragments that could be gathered up, but more that was untrue. One writer copied from another, and added to or abstracted from as he saw fit. They all contained accounts of many things which I never uttered and never performed; and some of the miracles which were said to have been done by me never were done. I never spoke while an infant in my cradle and said to my mother that I was the son of God, and that my father had sent me for the salvation of the world, as is recorded in the apocryphal gospel called "Infancy of Jesus Christ." Neither did I change a mule into a young man by sitting on his back, as is narrated in the same gospel. Neither did I, when seven years of age, make oxen, asses, and birds, of clay, and then animate them, the birds flying away, and the oxen and asses walking off. Neither did I stretch boards when sawed too short by my father, Joseph, the carpenter. Neither did I call kids out of a fiery furnace and change them into boys. Neither did I kill a Jew boy. Neither did I cause blindness, nor cure it. I did not cause a boy to wither. Neither did I change water into wine. Neither did I feed five thousand people with five loaves and two fishes, though the writer of Matthew told it twice to insure its belief. Neither did I raise to life a young woman that was dead. Neither did I cast out two thousand devils from one man, nor two men (Matthew says two men, Mark says one). Neither did I cast out seven devils from one woman. Neither did I cast out devils from anybody, nor make devils come out of people's mouths. I never saw a devil—unless some human beings may be called devils—and there were none for me to cast out. The very fact that so much was said about devils, and their being cast out, is the strongest kind of proof of the ignorance and falsehood of the times. Why do not people in this more enlightened age talk about epileptics, lunatics, and all kinds of insane people having devils? And why do not scientific physicians, when they attempt to cure epilepsy, lunacy, fits, and insanity, commence by trying to cast out a dozen or two of devils? It is simply because they have learned better. It is because they have learned that those are diseased conditions of the system, and not devils at all.

"'Neither did my crucifixion,' Jesus further remarked, 'cause an earthquake, the temple to be rent, and the dead in their graves to be reanimated and walk forth into the city. No more did I ascend bodily up into heaven, as the writers of the gospels and all Christian teachers have tried to make out. None of these things ever occurred. The only existence they ever had was in the brains of ignorant and dishonest people, precisely the same as with all the gods men have talked about so much. All these narratives are mere fabrications, nothing more, nothing less; and people have to be exceedingly gullible to believe them. As I said, these big stories were repeated from mouth to mouth for many years, and finally different persons undertook to commit them to writing, but in doing so they were no more inspired than are those who narrate any other events, real or imaginary. One thing is most sure, not one of the books called the gospels was written by the person whose name it bears, and not for a hundred years after the time when the events were said to have happened. They are mere compilations, made up from fragments gathered up from various sources, wherever they could be found. Every person ought to be able to realize how extremely imperfect and incorrect any report must be of the sayings of any speaker if the report was not reduced to writing for fifty or one hundred years after the speeches were delivered. It would even be impossible now, when the world has advanced greatly in intelligence, to report a speaker correctly from memory, even though it were written out within three days from the time of speaking. How much less accuracy should be expected, then, when fifty years and more have intervened?

"'Not one of the four gospels in the New Testament canon was known to be in existence until the latter part of the second century, and the authority of the canon itself was settled by wrangling bishops and priests in councils, who knew no more which books were true and which false, which inspired and which not inspired, than infants just born. One council accepted as genuine a certain set of gospels and epistles, a part of which a succeeding council would set aside, to again be restored by still another council. Thus was established, in the most untruthful and unsatisfactory manner, what is called "the inspired word of God." Oh, what impositions have been palmed off upon credulous human beings! If persons would only be reasonable and considerate they could easily understand that the narratives called gospels can not be reliable and trustworthy, for it will be seen that such things as the narrators could not possibly have seen or heard are detailed with just as much particularity and assurance as though the writers had been present when the reputed events occurred. As an instance may be mentioned what is called the "incarnation." Matthew and Luke, even if they wrote the books ascribed to them, were not present and could not know anything about the wonderful claim. Neither do they once claim to be inspired, or to write by divine aid. It was the same with the temptation, being conveyed by the devil, and the transfiguration. At the latter neither Matthew, Mark, nor Luke was present, but see how minutely Matthew relates it; while John, who was said to be there, has not a word to say about it. And how could either of them know about my prayer when alone by myself in Gethsemane? How could they know what Pilate's wife had dreamed? How could they know of the conversation that took place between Judas and the high-priests? How about the talk between the priests and the Roman soldiers? It is very evident they could not know about any of those things, and that in writing what they did they either drew upon their imagination or made use of groundless traditions and legends that never possessed the element of truth. How can people be led by the nose for a whole lifetime, and for centuries, by such idle tales?

"'It is the same,' he continued, 'with the reputed prophecies which were said, and are yet believed, to have been made relative to my debut on the earth. Many of these are cited in the Old Testament as having direct reference to myself, by which the power of the Divine Being is surely portrayed. But what are the facts? Why, not one of those so-called prophecies have the slightest reference to me, and

Mind and Matter.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: How very much is comprehended in these two words, mind and matter! They comprehend all things created, visible and invisible, and everything that pertains to man's interest, both in the past, present, and future.

From the word matter we understand it to signify substance—anything that is perceptible to the sense of sight or feeling. All surrounding objects, both animate and inanimate, are composed of matter; nor is the term confined to this sphere alone, on which man has his existence, but it reaches out into the broad and endless space of the transparent heavens, and takes in and comprehends those hundreds and thousands of worlds and systems of worlds, all illuminated and sparkling like so many precious diamonds in the brilliant rays of the sun.

Mind, in the more common acceptation of the term, signifies the intellectual or reasoning faculty of man. But the broad and significant term does not rest here, but extends down through all animal creation, and connects itself with vegetable creation. Yes, nor does it stop here, but reaches down to the bottom step and diffuses and incorporates itself in what is termed inanimate matter. Mind, in the more perceptible manifestation, is that principle which holds within itself the ability of contemplation, and is not by any law of nature or reason confined to the human being, but diffuses itself throughout all animal, vegetable, and mineral creation. Man, by the principle of contemplation, designs a house, and proceeds, under the law of mind, to represent the nature of his mind by physical figures and representations, and constructs a house for some selfish purpose—to answer some peculiar object of the future; hence, contemplation. All of these physical manifestations are the result of the force of mind. Now, if it can be shown that any creature besides the human being contemplates or forms designs for the future, the fact is then established that mind is coherent of that creature. The little bird that flies so swiftly through the forest, forming angles and semicircles, and thus dodging the trees and projecting limbs, is governed by thought and presence of mind, else how could it so expertly shun those surrounding dangerous obstacles save by presence of mind and forethought? It would be as likely to thrust itself against the body of a tree or some of its projecting limbs, and thus annihilate its own existence. And, to carry the argument still further, what principle is it that actuates that little creature to fly miles from her forest home, accompanied by her companion, and accumulate little straws, feathers, twine, hair, etc., and carry them back to the tree in which she has designed to build her little house and nest, and there construct it with an ingenuity of skill that would baffle the genius of the human mind? This is all done for some future purpose, showing clearly the presence of mind and a precontemplation, and the little scientific nest which she has formed is only a manifestation of the inner working of the mind represented by figures and physical forms.

The one and the same principle that actuated the man to construct his house for his own comfort and for the propagation and safety of his kindred has also actuated the little bird to build her nest for her own comfort and for the propagation and safety of her kind.

Now there is no difference in the kind of mind that has actuated these two creatures—man and bird—only a difference in the degree of their manifestation; and what is true of man and bird is also true of all existing creatures.

Now as it is impossible to draw a line of distinction which will clearly separate the human from the animal creation, either physically or mentally, or to draw a line that will clearly distinguish the animal and vegetable creation, or yet the vegetable and mineral creation, thus it follows that mind is a coherent of all substances—animal, vegetable, and mineral—manifested in the greater degree, first in the human, then in the animal, then in the vegetable, and lastly in mineral and inanimate matters, there being a connecting chain from the very lowest order of matter to the highest—from the inanimate to the highest order of animation.

Inanimate. This term is improperly applied. There can be no such thing as an inanimate substance. All things possess life; even the very stones under our feet are animate. Life-animation and mind are all one and the same thing. And to separate mind from matter would annihilate the existence of both.

Matter is a substance created; mind is the phenomena connected with the changes of that substance, mind not being that matter, but being the result of the action of that matter.

Man appears to be of a threefold nature, or possessing three distinct characters. First, the physical, that part which is seen and felt; second, the mental, that part which derives its existence from the action of matter—the physical; third, that part or principle which operates matter—the physical—and causes the second—the mental—to exist.

This combination of characters is a little system in itself, to provide for and operate itself, but confined and subjected to the great external laws of its being, which is a living power of the Creator.

Man derives his existence from some foreign power, after which he becomes a power in himself to operate, modify, and construct himself—to render himself miserable or happy, thus becoming a free moral agent to himself. All unhappiness and misery is the result of the violation of some of the natural laws pertaining to his being, over which he holds the power to divert.

Misery is the result of sin. Sin is the violation of some physical law. There can be no sin where there is no action of matter, or the physical part. Hence all transgression and sin must necessarily be confined to the physical man and must consist in some movement or gesture of his physical parts.

I repeat that mind and matter can never be separated or individualized. The only means that God can employ to punish his creatures is by the action of matter. God's great and natural laws consist in the movement and action of matter, therefore if any man suffer, it must be by the action of matter. If man is punished at all, he himself must be the cause of that punishment. God punishes none of his creatures directly, only inasmuch as he is the author of the great and natural laws to govern his creatures, the violation of which must necessarily meet the unhappy results.

As to the existence of a hell—a place for the punishment of man, as commonly understood—there is no such place or thing. As to a heaven—a place of happiness that will individualize and locate man—it does not exist. As to the existence of a devil, it is a vain word and possesses no character. As to the existence of angels—men having wings and possessing quills and feathers—the very thought is too absurd to admit of argument.

Each and all of these superstitious ideas are the result of a morbid condition of the mind and should receive no credit by rational, intellectual beings. All duties required of man in this life pertain to this life, consisting of action, man toward man and the surrounding creatures, and must, in every particular, be confined and subjected to the great laws of nature.

Love, which is the true law of nature, is productive of the highest code of ethics, and has for its fruits peace and happiness, and thus creates for itself a heaven. The absence of love is manifested by selfish acts, which seek to bestow upon self that which belongs to another. This being a violation of the great natural moral law of the continuation and longevity of its species, produces misery and creates for itself a hell. It is only by the presence of misery that we are enabled to judge and distinguish right from wrong.

The law demands of us each to work for the other's happiness in order to secure our own, and we hav learned this law by experience.

Worship of every nature and character is an error and a wrong which has affected the human family from the earliest stage of history and still has its powerful coils wrapped around the human mind and conscience.

Worship is a powerful coil; it binds man's conscience and freedom, and subjects him to a state of servitude and degradation. It hampers progression, and reduces science to a rude and vulgar form. O thou black superstitious worship, when wilt thou release thy grasp on thy subject and let the human mind step forth in light and liberty? O thou monster superstition, when wilt thou remove that black and terrible cloud which thou hast kept suspended over the head of poor man so many thousand years, and giv us one peep at the glorious sun, one revelation of light and truth?

Worship is a derangement of the mind, which presumes to possess the science or facility of corresponding with God, or the great Creator of all existing things. It vainly supposes its subject to be in intimate communication with the great and original cause of all things. It erroneously supposes that great Omnipotent Power to be of a mental organization similar to its own, and consequently capable of communication, as man with man. This superstitious idea is too absurd to receive any support by good reason or logic.

I hav already shown you the relation of mind and matter, and their union. Also the existence of a foreign power that has created and put these things into existence.

Now to support the theory that God is independent and incomprehensible, and also incapable of communicating with his creatures or his creatures with him, suffice to say that no two beings or creatures can possibly communicate with each other unless they possess similar properties in part or whole. And so all communication to the human being must be confined to the movement of matter, the like incorporating itself with the like by the laws of attraction and repulsion affecting molecular movement. It therefore follows that in order to communicate with our Creator we must possess some of the properties which the Creator possesses. If this were the case we would no longer be creatures, but creators, as we would be possessing the creative properties, hence powers. We would then cease to be men and become gods. Now, my friends, I ask you, in the name of reason, how could it be possible for man to comprehend his creator when the wisest of us cannot tell or explain—minutely—how one spear of grass grows, that little simple thing, under the observation of our eye every day, notwithstanding its simplicity, but in the explanation of which the wisest sage in the world becomes confounded.

Then talk you of comprehending and communicating with that great omnipotent power which has created thousands of worlds and system of worlds, of which ours is but a mere speck! O my friends, it appears to me like madness! It is possible for the Creator to understand the actions of his creatures and to know the wishes and desires of man, because they of themselves represent in part the will of their Creator. But it is impossible for God to express to his creatures his desires or wishes. God's will and desire is always made manifest in the formation and action of the creature itself. As nothing can exist contrary to God's will, we are forced to take it as granted that whatever does exist is in accordance with his will. And herein is the language of God to his creatures: "The creature itself, and the laws that govern that creature, is the true and living language of God, and there is no other." Hence the absurdity of the idea of God talking or communicating with his creatures, either directly or indirectly. I therefore claim, from the best authority and reason, that all communications or inspirations (so called) declaring to hav originated and come as a commandment from God our Creator are a gross delusion and a positive falsehood. And please remember that I by no means except the work called the Bible, but, on the contrary, believe it to be the most absurd, profane, fictitious history ever presented to man, excepting the manifested spirit of some of its characters.

It is a poor truth that will not balance itself; it is a poor law that does not hold within itself the elements of truth and the power of demonstration. These the Bible fail to do. It is incapable of proving its declaration. It does not possess the elements of truth, as a whole, nor the power of self-demonstration, but, on the contrary, contradicts itself and makes of God a liar. If the Bible, in the spirit of her language, shall contradict and ignore some great and powerful law of nature, which shall we believe, the word which is a subject of the law or the law itself? Which shall we believe, this dry, insignificant, lifeless word, the Bible, or that great and powerful law which carries in itself life, love, power, and demonstration? I beg of you, my friends, to ponder this question well, and answer it with reason and with truth. Truth is more potent than fiction, and will eventually find its level. Truth is a living demonstration of power. Fiction is a lifeless, idle word—a dead letter.

Here lies the great sequel, Truth, which will eventually sink this erroneous, superstitious work, the Bible, in utter obliteration. Already has the germ been planted in the heart of man, and that great power which has created man and given him the superior power of reason will nurse it and cause it to grow, and giv it material to feed upon, and it will become a power in the earth to lead men from error to truth, from darkness into light.

Oh, the language of God! how grand! When God speaks to us he employs a language that we cannot misunderstand. He speaks to us through the law of nature, which carries with it power, truth, life, and love. He speaks to us through all the surrounding creatures, of which ourselves are a part. He speaks to us through the animated vegetation of the earth. He speaks to us through the beautiful and delicious fruits of each clime. He speaks to us through the tender and gorgeous flower of the field. He speaks to us through the beautiful trees of the forest. He speaks to us through the mild and refreshing breeze of the atmosphere. He speaks to us through the gentle murmur and rippling of the waters. He speaks to us through the wafting of the beautiful clouds. He speaks to us through the warm and invigorating rays of the sun. He speaks to us through the brilliant plants—those thousands and thousands of worlds, all animated and decorated with life and beauty. And he speaks to us through his little creature, the bird, decked and beautified with a thousand colors of gorgeous plumage, singing her merry, merry song of praise.

Oh, how beautiful, how grand, how sublime, the language of God! It is all a manifestation of life, truth, and love, and is enough to inspire the heart of a brute. It ought to inspire the heart of man and lead him to embrace a higher standard of truth than he does to day. Yes, it ought to lead us up and away from that low, degrading plane of self-error and superstition. It ought to inspire our hearts with love, zeal, and affection for each other. It ought to teach us the great truth that heaven is in the mind and not in the future.

O my friends, let us learn how to liv. Let us learn those great laws pertaining to our nature and being. Let us learn those great and essential truths pertaining to our present happiness. Let us learn how to make a heaven of this life, and death and the future will take care of themselves.

Idolatry.

By A. E. D.

"The God that others worship is not the God for me.
He has no parts nor body, and cannot hear nor see."*
My God is fair and comely, and brave and strong and true.
With nerve and sinew knit like steel, strong muscle, cord, and thew;
His brow is like a tablet on which grand thoughts are 'graved.
His locks, like sunlit ripples, above it soft are waved,
His eyes light up dark places as stars at midnight shine.
My God, though but a mortal, is more than half divine!

He speaks, and there is music of woodlands, and of seas
When stirred to minor cadence by some soft wooing breeze;
But, when his mood is wrathful against some monster wrong,
His voice is like the tempest's roar, far-reaching, fierce, and strong.
He frowns, and all the landscape is wrapped in sombre shade.
He smiles, and sunshine brightens on every hill and glade;
But though so high above me doth gracious ear incline,
My God, though but a mortal, is more than half divine!

If joy possess his bosom, then joy too is my guest.
If pain pricks his night pillow, I can no longer rest.
And when his thoughtful forehead is ploughed o'er deep with care,
I strew love's tender rose leaves to hide the furrows there.
But when grim fears beset me I seek his sheltering arm,
And in its strong protection feel far removed from harm.
He is a stalwart column round which I love to twine—
My God, though but a mortal, is more than half divine!

Oh, if my God forsake me, where, whither shall I flee?
For the God that others worship is not a God to me;
But how can he bereave me who is of me a part,
My soul, my mortal body, my pulse, my life, my heart?
Oh, nay, I will not doubt thee, my sun, my light, my air,
The one thing in creation that makes creation fair,
Idolatrous idolater! Idolatry sublime!
My God, though but a mortal, is more than half divine!

I hold as grand productions. They are modifying to iron creeds, and already the myths are beginning to fly from our midst through the influence of these sublime works. Their grand and scientific utterances hav placed Mrs. Slenker as a leader in the great army of bold Freethinkers.

The Beginning and the Progress of Human Nature.

BY DR. E. B. WHEELOCK.

As the science world moves onward and upward from the primeval age of man, it becomes interesting to grasp the hand of the present historian, and also that of the paleontologist, and march with them over the hills and plains once trodden by races long since extinct.

Oh, how crude must have been the early types of man! After the lapse of many ages we may contemplate him as slowly outgrowing his quadruped animalism, and gradually rising from the sovereignty of his own selfishness and barbarism, and, like the infant, by slow growth and experience he at length assumed the biped instead of the quadruped mode of locomotion. The law governing his common wants and needs, like that of ours to-day, became the sire and mother of his early and crude inventions.

As he rolled down the stream of time the laws of association and of communism gradually crept in as a matter of necessity. And as the long ages rolled their tardy round each wandering tribe sought to utilize their own vocal sounds, and thus we contemplate the primitive origin of nearly three thousand different languages now existing upon this our round and rolling earth. At first simple sounds and signs were used to express a want.

At length studied systems of language became a necessity as an artificial sign with which to express ideas. Hence human experience, through the avenue of the five senses, has ever been the royal road to human knowledge.

To suppose that a great Jehovah once used vocal sounds and a Hebrew dialect to enlighten primitive man is a pagan myth too silly for even a Fiji schoolboy to entertain. But so it is, and many ages must yet roll away before human nature as a whole will rise upon a plain of perfection outreaching the mythology of the past, or where man will cease to be the common enemy of man.

But as we flow down the stream of time improvements thicken. From trivial forms of government many noble nations did arise and pass away. The cave-dwellers, the flint-hewers, and the mound-builders are no more. The builders of pyramids and the embalmers of the ancient dead hav left their granite monuments and hav deserted the tombs of their fathers, and where are they?

The story of Egypt is old, but the story of India is older, and the story of the archæologist makes the continent of America older still. The prehistoric period of the world is yet to be written. Should we go back behind the world's sixteen crucified saviors we might find a million more, for the present enlightenment of the world has been the purchase of human toil and blood.

But time moves on; a Confucius is born; a Zoroaster livs; a Cicero mounts the forum, and a Demosthenes thunders the liberty of Greece; a Kepler mounts the stars, and a Newton sets all the world in motion; a Franklin interrogates the clouds, and a Morse encircles the earth with electric news; while a Fulton, with steam, conquers the waves of the sea and the floods of earth's rolling rivers. Philosophy now creeps from the dungeon of superstition, and commands the world to think. Science leaps upon the altar of inquiry and demonstrates the plurality of worlds and the indestructibility of matter; that man but holds a middle rank 'twixt heaven and earth, close to the realm where angels dwell, just on the boundary of a spirit land where the chain of being is complete and matter's last gradation is lost, whose next step is spirit, the next deity. What though the world has moved a pace in mechanical skill and in social ethics, much yet remains unlearned and unknown. The golden future is yet to come. The royal road that leads to universal brotherhood still lies ungraded and untrod. The tyrant's whip is still lifted over the backs of the weak, and the poor man's plea is seldom heard. While priestcraft sits upon its blood-stained cushion, gazing at its millions of untaxed church steeples, the poor widow must pay revenue on a box of matches, and even her sick babe is made to pay tribute to the government should it use a bottle of Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup. The public lands are deeded to the money-lender for speculation, while the unfortunate poor are branded as tramps or driven to suicide for the want of a little garden and a little home which the money shark has taken from him. And woman is but a chattel, not a citizen. If a criminal, she is tried and hung by her lords, with no judge or jury of her own sisterhood; no voice in the law. No holy ballot must be seen in her polluted fingers. A howling herd of zanies may make the nation's laws; her tongue must be mute. A negro is a citizen; she is not. But the sky opens apace. England has a Victoria for a queen, and we trust America e'er long will hav another for a President. What if buffoons should howl, let the fittest survive. Amen.

Go Thou and Do Likewise.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is only once in a great while, when something occurs which I think worthy of mention, that I ask the privilege of saying a word in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Week before last there was an article quoted by our village paper (the Naples Record), from a Michigan paper, to the effect that Col. Robt. Ingersoll was pulling down ancient structures without the ability or disposition to build up anything in their stead. It was not only a big lie, but a disgraceful "fling," such as only the church would indulge in.

I wrote a short article, couched in respectful language, in which was a quotation from a Western paper, where the Colonel is best known, setting forth his munificent gifts and donations to the poor and needy, etc.

The next Monday morning I went into the office of the Record and told the editor that I had called to see if he was in favor of fair play; and farther, that if the Colonel was tearing down the ancient structures of superstition, he was also building a monument for humanity, and that I regarded him as one of the grandest builders of modern times.

The editor looked carefully over the short article which I had prepared, and said he saw nothing objectionable in it, and would giv it a place. But when the paper was out the article aforesaid did not appear in its columns.

He saw me the next day and told me that the article had got covered over with other papers on his desk and overlook'd. I was well satisfied when he made this statement the article had not been forgotten or overlooked. I knew from the circumstances that it would be the very last thing he would forget, and so it proved; for I was told, by one who had a right to know, that the article was under discussion, and he concluded not to publish it, although he promised to do so.

I hav taken this paper for ten years, but shall order it stopped on the first of April. I regard this matter very much as the colonists did the tax on tea. I might be able to, and would stand it if there were not subjugation in the principle. Now I advise all Liberals to pursue the same course. When local papers for which you pay your money publish long, tedious, and silly articles on religion, or derogatory to the character of any of our noble standard bearers, or against our Liberal papers, write up an article in favor of taxing church property, or against superstition, or the aggressive nature of the church, or if unable to write, seek out from THE TRUTH SEEKER, or other Liberal paper or pamphlet, some short article upon these or kindred subjects, and then demand your editor to publish it. If he refuse let him be made to understand that Liberals can do without him as long as he can do without Liberals.

Let this course be vigorously pursued and editors will soon become more discreet, when they are made to understand that it don't pay to throw mud into the face of their betters. There are now good, newsy Liberal papers published in various localities in the country, and Liberals are no longer compelled, indirectly, to uphold superstition and support the churches through these whining, lying, hypocritical papers.

The church used to be supported mainly by recruits enlisted at protracted and camp-meetings, and through the efforts of sensational preachers; and when one of these recruits received a through ticket to the celestial depot, he was made to come down handsomely, and thus the Christian tub, in a measure was made to stand on its own bottom.

But the masses are becoming too intelligent to be longer caught in this gull-trap, and the tactics are changed. Ice cream suppers, fairs, shows, and gambling-tables and games now furnish the money that used to be wrung out of the recruits. Much of the money thus obtained is furnished by Liberals and outsiders. Hundreds of the churches would come down with a crash if it were not for the support of these pillars.

Now I do protest against this practice on the part of Liberals of gathering with one hand and scattering with the other. Any Liberal who thus aids and assists in building up the churches virtually takes up arms against the cause to which he owes allegiance. Better a thousand times that this money should go for Liberal lectures or literature to enlighten the masses.

Let Liberals everywhere be more decided and less time-serving. We hav a terrible battle before us, and our enemies are active and vigilant. They will adopt any mode of warfare which they may think will insure success. Let the line of battle be formed, and let Liberal soldiers be careful how they supply the enemy with means to destroy us. Plant the batteries of science all along the line, truth and reason our only weapons and common sense our shield. Push the fight vigorously. If I am to die in the last ditch, I shall go down cheerfully if my last gaze can only rest on a vanquished foe.

Any editor who stands with both feet on the Constitution, and uses his influence to muzzle the freedom of the press, and who will lie to uphold the church, is unworthy to receive support at the hands of an honest Liberal.

Naples, N. Y., March 29, 1880. JOHN PECK.

What is the Soul

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: This mooted question having been agitated through THE TRUTH SEEKER of late gave me a desire to say a few words, although I am not a scholar. A suggestion from an illiterate may awaken thought in one qualified to giv an elaborate expression.

I wish to ask what relation the moss bears to the decomposing rock; the vegetable to the mineral kingdoms; the wheat and corn to the stalks that bear to them; the fruit to the tree that gave it birth. Is not the moss the soul or spirit of the rock? the vegetable kingdom the soul of the mineral kingdom? the grain and fruit the soul of the stalk or the tree that gave them birth? the stalk and tree a chemical laboratory to digest and sublimate matter to be incorporated in the kernel and fruit? This done, the stalk may die, but the fruits become food for the human, again to be digested and sublimated, to reach a higher plane, the soul or intelligent human. Select a subject; put him into a clairvoyant state, and you will soon be convinced that a dual relation exists in one form, the physical and spiritual man, as you are that electricity exists in the earth and atmosphere when made visible to our senses by means of a galvanic battery.

It would be no greater tax on my blind belief that God breathed into the tree the breath of life to produce the living fruit, than it is to believe the breath of God in man produced a living soul, which was not real to Paul nor the followers of Christ except through another miracle—the visible to be transmuted into the incorporeal—and that, after it has decomposed and driven by the four winds or eaten by fish or other animals before dissolution, and incorporated into their forms. That matter goes back, as on a mission, to bring other matter up to its own plain, while itself is preparing for a higher position than it occupied before, is evident, as yeast in flour, manures on vegetables. In 1 Cor. xv, 46, Paul says, "Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which was natural, and afterward that which is spiritual."

Correct. This lesson is in all our surroundings from chaos to the present. We can draw no other conclusions, I think, in reason, from nature's teachings. The higher, more useful, and beautiful are developed from the lower every time. The wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err on that point.

In 1 Cor. xv, 31, Paul has stumbled into another port, "I die daily." If I die daily, I must be born daily to continue existence. Waste and supply is the law of existing forms in the spiritual as well as the physical.

It has been supposed by many that if the soul had a beginning it must hav an ending; consequently they conclude the ego, "I am," existed co-eval with God, and has come up, step by step, clothing itself in each animal form below man, in whom it has reached its highest goal physically and spiritually.

We need not fear of losing our identity so long as waste and supply continue to be a law of nature. Motion is a universal law of matter, I believe. Every thought expends a portion of soul matter, as truly as a motion of the hand expends a portion of physical matter. I do not believe my identity as a child of three days old exists other than historically, nor do I believe the soul of my Christian, praying life exists within the physical at the present. There is not a tenet of my Christian faith that I cannot now see was groundless. The old confederacy is dissolved and passed away and a new one formed. If it were not so, I should be a praying Christian to-day. The same machinery, in working order, would produce the same result. Through thought the old has slowly passed away, and a new soul is formed of other and more progressed atoms, and of superior mechanism, working out new conclusions and higher results more in harmony with nature. HERMON MUNSON.

not one of them had the least allusion to what should take place on the earth five, six, or seven hundred years afterwards. They are mostly crude and blind recitals of events that had taken place when the accounts were written or were just then transpiring. Not one, I repeat, had the slightest reference to myself. I can easily demonstrate this to you, but I will not now ask you to listen to it. If at any future time you have a curiosity in the matter, I will point out, one by one, those that are alluded to in the New Testament as well as the others claimed as prophecies of me, and fully convince you how utterly groundless they are. I ask again, Will people always be willing to be wheedled by such falsehoods?

"'The rapid spread of the system of religion called mine is often cited as a proof of its truth and divinity, but the evidence is insufficient. The religion of Buddha has had double the number of followers that Christianity can claim, and has about twice the number of adherents to-day. And even the religion of Mohammed, which started six hundred years later than mine, has nearly equaled it in the numbers and zeal of its devotees. There are good natural causes for the remarkable spread of each of these systems. They have all absolutely spread and become strong in consequence of the errors they contained. The early Christians had a very strong belief in the approaching end of the world, and of my appearing in the clouds in great glory and conveying them to my heavenly kingdom. This made them earnest, zealous, invincible. Yes, the belief in that error made them unwavering and triumphant. But very little of that zeal and steadfast belief is to be seen in the world now. Instead of that simple, earnest trust, the church has become a proud, fashionable, rich, intolerant ecclesiastical power, wholly unlike early Christianity. How great has been the degeneration! I taught poverty, mendicancy, and hatred of wealth. Do my professed followers distinguish themselves in following those instructions? Oh, no. No men despise poverty more; none so abhorrent of mendicancy; none so anxious to accumulate silver, gold, and other wealth of all kinds as those who claim to follow me. I said, "Take no thought for the morrow." Do modern Christians pay any heed to that injunction? By no means. They look ahead and calculate the chances of the future with as great anxiety as any people that ever lived. I taught to return good for evil; when one cheek was smitten, to turn the other also to be smitten; to return good for evil; to live in peace with all men, and to shed no human blood. Do my professed followers obey these injunctions? No! no! They not only return evil for evil, but often evil for good. No men have been more vindictive, savage, and cruel. When they are smitten, do they refuse to strike back? No. No people have been readier to retaliate when injured or insulted, to strike back when smitten, to levy war on those they imagine have wronged them, and even to press the most merciless and devastating wars, not only upon unbelievers, but upon their own brethren of the household of faith. No people in the world have done so much fighting as Christians; none have been more merciless; none have shed so much blood in the same length of time; none have made such extensive preparations; none have spent so much wealth for the purpose of injuring and killing their fellow-beings, and they more frequently, I say, fight and kill their own brethren. Christians have slaughtered in war scores of millions of their fellow-men; this too on the most frivolous of pretexts; and have persecuted for opinion's sake more than all other religions in the world.

"'I taught simplicity, humility, justice, mercy, love, humanity, kindness, and long suffering, but those who now shout my name on all occasions, and make such loud professions about their being followers of mine, are the very reverse of all these. They are the most proud and haughty people on the earth; they are guilty of the greatest injustice; they are the most unmerciful of men; they indulge in the most intense and relentless hatred; they are cruel and persecuting, depriving of their just rights those who do not yield allegiance to them; they hesitate not to cause the most poignant grief and unhappiness; in short, they do nothing that I enjoined and commanded, while they do everything that I disowned and forbade. They have no characteristics in common with myself, and they take pleasure in doing everything entirely contrary to my earnest injunctions. I can say in truth I have not the slightest respect for them; I disown them and repudiate them entirely and forever. They are unworthy of me, and also unworthy of the love and respect of all honorable, honest-hearted men and women.

"'Excuse me, Mercury,' said he, 'for detaining you so long and intruding upon your attention so much that you are not materially interested in, but my mind dwells much on these themes, and once in a while I like to unburden it. There is much more I would like to say to you on cognate subjects, but will not weary you longer at this time. If at any time you feel like being button-holed again for an hour or two, call around and give me a chance. By the way, if you see that TRUTH SEEKER man—I believe you call upon him occasionally—give him my kindest regards; tell him he has my sympathy and that I am not unmindful of the mean and dishonorable class of bigots and persecutors who are trying to crush him. Tell him to continue fearless and courageous, and assure him, though they may crush him to the earth and bring his life to a close, that truth will not die, that justice must live, and that the better part of his countrymen will defend him in his rights and will recognize the truths he enunciates and his zeal and earnestness in their defense.'

"There, Bennett," continued Mercury for himself, "I guess I have pretty thoroughly tired you out with my long recital. I have not repeated all that Jesus said to me, but probably enough for one time. If you wish it, I may call upon you again, either during your short stay in this prison or after you regain your liberty, and give you more of his words, as well as say other things to you that may be interesting to you. You can print what I said if you wish to, as I know you are quite a man for printing what you please. I don't think it will hurt anybody to read it."

"My good friend," I observed, "I thank you sincerely for your kindness in calling upon me and interesting me so deeply in what you have had to say. I hope you will come again whenever you feel like it. I have respect for such gods as you are, and will always be ready to communicate with you when agreeable to you. I will be just as glad to see you when a free man as when behind these bolts and bars. But let me ask you one question. You have said the gods are the mere thoughts and imaginations of men. Do these remarks apply to Jesus, or has he more reality and substance about him than other gods?"

"There is not very much difference," he replied. "His worshipers are more living and active than those of many of the other gods, but he obtained his existence as a god much in the same way as the others, and has about the same amount of absolute existence. But it is getting to be morning, and I must return to the celestial regions. This is All Fools' Day morning, but you must not, on that account, think any the less of what I have said. Good-bye."

At that word he was gone, and I have not seen him since. When I awoke, all that he said was clearly impressed upon my mind, and I have been able to give it to you, my friends, pretty correctly. I hope I have not wearied you beyond measure, but the dream seemed somewhat remarkable to me, and I wished to relate it to you. I repeat what I said in the fore part of this letter, that I believe American citizens have a right to dream and to tell their dreams if they can get anybody to listen to them; and I trust that this little bit of liberty may be theirs yet for many years. I hope Congress will not pass a law making it punishable in the penitentiary for a man to dream even an unorthodox dream, with double punishment if he tells it. Our liberties are already much curtailed, and I hope we will be allowed to dream all we wish to.

In an ordinary way I do not attach any importance to my dreams, and very seldom allude to them, but when Mercury comes to see me, and makes himself so interesting I want to let you know about it and share the pleasure with you.

Now a word more and I am done. Mercury spoke about the enlargement of the work I have been writing. It is true. I found it grew so on my hands, and the subjects were so important, that I could not get all in the compass of a single volume. So I have added to it, and now it will make two large octavo volumes, which I hope will interest many of you for years to come. Volume I. treats upon the gods, ancient and modern, including Jenovah, Jesus, the Holy Ghost, Virgin Mary, and the Bible, which latter the Protestants make a god of. Volume II. will contain a full account of all the principal religions of the world, including Judaism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. The last will be treated at considerable length, and in the form of a criticism, as also is Judism. In view of the fact that both ancient and modern gods and religions are treated, the work will be entitled "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." I think a larger work has never been written in prison by any person.

Volume I. will contain a steel-plate engraving of myself as before I came to prison, and Volume II, will contain a steel-plate engraving of myself as I am now in my prison garb, and representing the posture in which we are required to stand. Volume I. is now in press, and will be ready to send to subscribers the latter part of April. Volume II. will be ready in a very few weeks later—probably in May. The first volume will be sent at once to those who have ordered the work, without waiting for the completion of the second volume. The work would not be dear at eight or even ten dollars, but will be sold at three dollars per volume. Those who have already bespoken it can take one or both volumes, as they prefer. I shall sell the work to those who have ordered it—the two volumes—at $5.00, in nice cloth binding, $7.00 in leather and red edges, or $8.00 in morocco and gilt edges. I will also sell it at the same prices to all who order before the first of June. The regular price per volume will be $3.00, $4.00, and $4.50. It will be seen, then, that I deduct one dollar on the entire work to those who have already ordered, or see fit to order it before June 1st. The deduction will only be made to those who take both volumes. I assure you, my friends, the work is cheap at the prices I have set upon it. If you think it is not, after you have seen it, and wish to exchange it for other publications of mine, I will accommodate you. I would like to sell a copy of the work to ten thousand of you, but will compromise on five thousand, and really hope you will not ask me to make it less than one thousand. I think those who own it will not have occasion to regret they made the purchase. Send in the orders.

I may be permitted to write you once more while here, but will at all events be able to talk freely with you again after the present month. I am hopefully your friend,

D. M. BENNETT.

For Mr. Bennett's Reception.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: The day of your husband's release is near at hand, and we feel anxious to do a great deal to help make his reception a success, but we can do but little, and that little we do cheerfully. Inclosed please find two dollars for that purpose. MILO MINER.

Angola, March 27, 1880. SALLIE J. MINER.

WE hav Wm. McDonnell's new book, "Family Creeds," in paper covers, for 75 cents. A new cloth edition is being prepared.

The Reception.

Last week we announced that the reception to be tendered to Mr. Bennett would take place in Cooper Union. The Committee were informed that they could have the hall, but since then church bigotry has turned up in an unexpected place. When the sub-committee appointed to secure the hall went to Mr. Zachos he was informed that the matter would hav to be laid before the trustees, and that the Hon. Abe Hewett, ex-Congressman, would probably decide the matter. The trustees met that evening and decided that the Union could not be let for the purpose.

Deeply indignant at this manifestation of sectarian spleen, and feeling that as the Union is a trust for the benefit of the public and not the property of a narrow sect, the Committee prepared and sent in the following protest, accompanied by a paper signed by such prominent men as Hon. Abram Wakeman, ex-Judge Dittenhoefer, T. B. Wakeman, Edward F. Underhill, and Mr. Post, of the New York Truth, regretting that discrimination should be made in the matter, and asking the trustees to reconsider their decision:

SCIENCE HALL, 141 EIGHTH ST., N. Y., April 5, 1880.

To the Hon. Peter Cooper, Daniel V. Tieman, Esq., John E. Parsons. Esq., Hon. Wilson G. Hunt, Hon. Edward Cooper, and Hon. Abram S Hewett, Trustees of Cooper Union,

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, a committee appointed by a large and respectable meeting of citizens of New York to arrange for a reception, to be given to the Liberal editor, Mr. D. M. Bennett, at the conclusion of his term of unjust imprisonment for bravely defending the cause of free speech and free mails, respectfully but earnestly protest against your action in closing the doors of Cooper Union to our contemplated meeting, and ask, after we present a few facts, that you will reconsider your late decision as given to Hugh Byron Brown in reply to his application on behalf of this committee of which he is a member.

In the first place, we would assure you that the meeting is not the conception of an irresponsible rabble. The names associated with it and to be represented at it either in person or by letter, are such as those of the Hon. Elizur Wright, the distinguished historian, James Parton, and Courtlandt Palmer, Esq. You will also observe by the accompanying paper that it has the indorsement of the Hon. Abram Wakeman, Judge Dittenhoefer, and other well-known citizens. The names of a hundred or more equally as prominent could be obtained if we had a week's time in which to apply for them. Those appended were obtained in a few moments.

Secondly, we would remind you that the old "Cradle of Liberty," Faneuil Hall, of Boston, was allowed to be used for a similar purpose in the summer of 1878. E. H. Heywood was imprisoned for mailing the same pamphlet for the mailing of which Mr. D. M. Bennett was incarcerated. Moreover, he (Heywood) was its author. Faneuil Hall can only be obtained on application of fifty well-known freeholders and the permission of the Board of Councilmen. The necessary names (some of Boston's best) were immediately given to the application, and the Common Council yielded prompt assent. Over six thousand people assembled on that occasion to express their indignation at Mr. Heywood's imprisonment.

The trustees in letting Cooper Union are certainly not responsible for the opinions uttered therein. It was let formerly to Mrs. Woodhull and hundreds of others for the expression of views far more adverse to those of the general public, and probably to your own, than any that will be expressed by the friends of Mr. Bennett. They simply intend to express their approbation of him as an advocate of free thought, a free press, and free mails. We have always felt a pride in Cooper Union, and the impartiality of its administration. We hav regarded it as the place above all others in New York where the cause of the people may be presented when their liberties or interests are assailed. We are unwilling to believe that you will make personal discriminations or adopt a tariff of sentiments by which its impartial use is to be limited.

We offer this communication as a manly protest against the "lock-out" at Cooper Union, and not as an appeal for the use of the hall, for other halls can be obtained in any number, as we hav already ascertained. But believing you hav refused us under misapprehension, we desire to place the real facts before you in order that you may do yourselves, as well as this Committee, justice. The arrangements of this Committee are such that we must hav your final decision before four o'clock this afternoon. All of which is respectfully submitted by

DANIEL E. RYAN,
EDWARD W. SEARING,

Reception Committee.

By order of Reception Committee,
E. B. FOOTE, JR., Sec'y.

To this the following answer was returned:

NEW YORK, April 6, 1880.

HUGH B. BROWN, ESQ., Dear Sir: Your communication of the 5th inst., and letter of remonstrance from Messrs. Ryan, Searing, Lockwood, and others, were submitted to the trustees at their meeting last evening. I am requested by them to say that after careful consideration they decline to reconsider their previous decision.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
L. C. L. JORDAN,
Clerk Cooper Institute.

Pending this negotiation and final decision the Committee was not inactive, but went to work to secure another place. On Tuesday they secured Chickering Hall, Fifth avenue and Eighteenth street, the finest hall in the city, capable of accomodating fifteen hundred or more. The reception will assuredly take place there on Sunday evening, May 2d. The date has to be changed with the hall.

It is a matter of regret to the Liberals of this city that the managers of Cooper Union are so narrow-minded and bigoted. Peter Cooper, the generous donor of this splendid hall, belongs to a sect which has itself felt the heavy hand of intolerant persecution. A few short years ago the Unitarians were socially and religiously sat down upon by their orthodox brethren, and it ill becomes them now, when they are stronger, to turn upon the Infidels and exhibit the same intolerant spirit. This act will be remembered a long time, and we are mistaken also if the Hon. Abram S. Hewitt does not find the part he acted brought up some time when he is asking the suffrages of the people. The hall could be let to John Surratt, an accomplice in the murder of Lincoln, but when it is asked for a reception for an Infidel suffering from church persecution, it is coldly refused. It seems that in the minds of the trustees a murderous Christian is better than an honest Infidel. If that is the candid opinion of Peter Cooper, Daniel Tieman, J. E. Parsons, Wilson G. Hunt, Edward Cooper, and Abram S. Hewitt, we are glad they hav written it down. The public now know where to place them. The idea that Cooper Union is a hall for the people, like Faneuil Hall, of Boston, must be given up, and the fact that it is a sectarian institution acknowledged. We liv and learn in these days.

The reception at Chickering Hall will be presided over by the Hon. Elizur Wright, as will be seen by his letter appended:

BOSTON, MASS., April 2, 1880.

T. C. LELAND, ESQ., My Dear Sir: My coolest judgment is that you can do better than to hav me take the chair or make my speech at the Bennett reception. My heart is in it, but my strength is weakness in that line. I hav no gospel rivals to be bitter upon, as Paul had; but, if I had, they would hav some reason to say of me, as his did of him, ["For his letters, say they, are weighty and powerful, but his bodily presence is weak and his speech contemptible."] (See 2 Cor. x, 10.)

The meeting ought to be a success, and I hav no doubt will be; and, that it may be, there should be no disappointments. You ran too much risk of one by announcing a month beforehand a man of my age and infirmity, who would not be the best at a certainty. If you will be so foolish, I shall try to help you out of the scrape as well as I can.

Yours sincerely, ELIZUR WRIGHT.

We don't agree with Mr. Wright at all in his quotation from scripture. If Paul's enemies could say it no more justly of him than can Mr. Wright's, we should hav a better opinion of that ancient worthy than we get from the Bible.

The Committee also received the following letters from Moses Hull and J. M. L. Babcock:

BOSTON, MASS., April 2, 1880.

T. C. LELAND, Dear Sir: I will be with you on the occasion of Mr. Bennett's reception, and glad of an opportunity to unite my voice with those of the great, good, fearless souls of this country in welcoming the grand old hero to his friends. Of course the meeting will be a success.

A time must surely come when justice to all such as Mr. Bennett will be done. Public sentiment is becoming revolutionized. The time is not far distant when Comstock and his allies will be considered a disgrace by every decent truth loving person.

With many good wishes for the enterprise,

I am, sincerely,

MOSES HULL.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., April 4, 1880.

T. C. LELAND, ESQ., Dear Sir: Your kind invitation to be present at a public reception of D. M. Bennett on May 1st has been received. I hav an eager desire to attend and make my protest against the great wrong which has been done to him, and will cordially accept your invitation, subject only to the condition that my physical condition, which is now quite poor, will be sufficient for the trip.

Yours cordially, J. M. L. BABCOCK.

A list of speakers will be given soon as all are heard from.

We hope that everybody who can will come. The meeting should be an immense one. The Committee will make such arrangements with the hotels that friends can be accommodated at very low rates. Remember, the meeting will be held at Chickering Hall, corner of Fifth avenue and Eighteenth street, Sunday evening, May 2d, at 8 o'clock.

A Card from the Committee.

TO THE FRIENDS OF D. M. BENNETT: The Committee of Arrangements desire to say to Mr. Bennett's friends everywhere that the reception to be given him will necessarily cost considerable money, a large proportion of which has been subscribed; and while they do not desire to importune them, yet if any feel a desire to contribute their mite toward defraying expenses it will be thankfully received and sacredly devoted to making the reception a splendid success. Those so desiring can remit to H. B. Brown, Treasurer of Committee, 141 8th street, New York city.

DANIEL E. RYAN,
Chairman Committee.

Mr. Parton's Last Monthly Contribution.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I inclose my monthly contribution, wishing it were ten times as large.

You are going to giv your chief a reception, I see. This is well. All New York ought to turn out and mark its sense of the immeasurable iniquity of the sentence he is now serving out—the worst thing done in this country under the forms of law since the Alien and Sedition trials of 1798. You will not forget, I trust, that Mr. Bennett is not as young as he was once, and that he has been in prison many months. Take good care of him. Don't kill him with kindness. Let all be done with dignity and moderation, and with due regard to his condition.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

Bundy at the Battle Creek Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Bundy was here at our late Convention, but his reception was a cold one, I assure you; so much so that he was not invited to make any remarks, and notwithstanding Dr. Spencer, of this place, made a tremendous effort by speeches and by trying to force a copy of the Religio into the hands of every one, as they passed him, he did not, as I understand, succeed in getting a single subscriber. Besides, his effort came very near raising a regular row, so much so that Bundy, stepping from the rear of the audience to the front, begged the privilege of an explanation, and said the Doctor had acted on his own responsibility without any connivance or act upon his part. Harmony was finally restored, but many kept grating their teeth as they thought of what had been done.

ADRIAN.

Battle Creek, Mich.

Paine and Washington.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Parson Dodd and other clerical calumniators of Thomas Paine are fond of quoting the last scathing sentence of his letter to George Washington. It is, I admit, the most unfortunate sentence ever written by the "Author-hero of the Revolution," and the only one in all his works that I would expunge.

But there is some doubt that he ever did write it, and it is possible that an enemy sowed that tare in order to make the letter still more offensive and damaging to Paine's reputation.

I hav a very early printed copy of the letter which does not contain the obnoxious sentence. It was published in Baltimore in 1802, and evidently with the cognizance and probable sanction of the author, who was then residing in Washington, only forty miles distant. It purports to be "copied from one printed in Baltimore in the year 1797," which was probably the earliest and perhaps only prior edition.

But even if the original letter and first publication did contain that final sentence, there is evidence that the author repented of his rashness by expunging it from the later edition.

And yet if any candid man will put himself in Paine's place, he must be compelled to admit that there was some excuse if not justification for the strong language even of the doubtful passage. Gen. Washington had been a friend of Paine, and had once written to him these words:

Your presence may remind Congress of your past services to this country; and if it is in my power to impress them, command my best exertions with freedom, as they will be rendered cheerfully, by one who entertains a lively sense of the importance of your works (Moreau's Test. to Thomas Paine).

Now take an extract from Paine's letter to President Washington in the last year of his second term:

I was imprisoned on the ground of being born in England; and your silence in not inquiring the cause of that imprisonment, and reclaiming me against it, was tacitly giving me up. I ought not to hav suspected you of treachery; but whether I recover from the illness I now suffer, or not, I shall continue to think you treacherous till you giv me cause to think otherwise. I am sure you would hav found yourself more at your ease had you acted by me as you ought; for whether your desertion of me was intended to gratify the English government, or to let me fall into destruction in France, that you might exclaim the louder against the French Revolution, or whether you hoped by my extinction to meet with less opposition in mounting up the American government; either of these will involve you in reproach you will not easily shake off.

Who of us, if he had suffered such cruel and heartless neglect from a former friend, whose single word would hav opened the prison door, would not hav felt that still stronger words of reprobation were justifiable?

But if Paine did close his letter by saying: "The world will be puzzled to decide whether you are an apostate or an impostor—whether you hav abandoned good principles, or whether you ever had any," it is certain that in this instance and up to this time he has failed in the role of prophet. And although I say there is a doubt, from present external evidence, of the authenticity of the above sentence, yet from internal evidence I should say that it came from the same hand that wrote "the tremendous invectives and malignant sarcasms of Junius." Indeed many parts of the letter, like those written to Lord Howe, and like passages in the original draft of the Declaration of Independence, betray the strong characteristics of "the brilliant pen of Junius," which "in the plenitude of its rage gave elegance to bitterness," and though it "was drawn forth in vain" in 1772, yet in his last words the writer promised, "If Junius livs you shall often be reminded of it," which promise I aver was fulfilled in America, England, and France.

A Characteristic Letter from Mr. Babcock.

[We are not quite sure but our genial friend intended this letter to be private, but we are going to print it, anyway.—ED. T. S.]

FRIEND MACDONALD: I have just returned from the Spiritualists' and Liberalists' annual convention, which was held at Battle Creek, Mich. It was a big thing—so much so that it became necessary to make use of both of the public halls to accommodate the multitude that was present. To-day they are free from debt, and hav established a free rostrum, where every one may dare to express his honest opinion. I offered to sell twenty-five of my beautiful books entitled "Superstition, the Religion of 'Believe or be Damned,'" in five lots, five for one dollar, and send the money to you as an expression of respect, and to aid you a little in the reception of the old hero, D. M. Bennett. Five hands went up to indicate that they would take a dollar's worth of the books. I also said, if they preferred, the money should be given to aid the Appeal, a new Liberal paper, just started. A man said, "Giv mine to the Appeal." The next three were ladies, and as I delivered the books each one whispered, "Send my money to Mr. Bennett." Now, you can't think how I did wish that I was a minister of the gospel, so that I could, with propriety, have kissed those ladies—of course I mean a holy kiss. Your friend Moore, of Adrian, said, "Send my money to Bennett." The Appeal got lots of subscribers, and all want it to succeed; but the hearts of many seemed to say, "Let the old hero hav a reception." I, without doubt, could hav got a good collection for that purpose; but the Society was in debt, and as I knew that they would hav to contribute largely to pay off the debt—and they did it—my excessive modesty would not allow me to ask for more. I send you the money, and may Mrs. Bennett bless her husband, and may they liv long and be happy. Yours very truly, M. BABCOCK.

New Auxiliary Leagues.

177. Yankton, Dakota. Secretary, D. P. Willcox.
178. Oswego, Kansas. Secretary, George F. King.
179. Eureka, Nevada. Secretary, Henry M. Faust. Starts with 100 working members.

The Yankton League organized with twenty-five members, and promises to become a local power in educating the people in political matters. The most prosperous Leagues avoid discussing religious topics, and keep to such as are presented by the platform and resolutions of the National Liberal League.

Letters from Friends.

FRANKTON, IND., March 30, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find five dollars to be applied on a copy of Bennett's book as soon as it is out. I want the first book that is bound. I want in in morocco and gilt edges. My best wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and my most heartfelt sympathy for Mr. and Mrs. Bennett. L. R. WEBB.

DANSVILLE, MICH., March 8, 1880.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Mrs. Amy Post's letter to Abbot has the right ring to it (what a pity we havn't a few more such noble women!) and T. C. Leland's dissection of Abbot's Eighth Demand is grand. The wonder is that Abbot and Bundy don't go off somewhere and hate themselves, and do penance for their past evil deeds, and then turn over a new leaf and try and be somebody, and in the future keep their noses out of other people's business.

Yours for the broadest liberty, E. J. SMITH.

WEST UNION, Dec. 5, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Hav been thinking for some time that we, the Liberals of the United States, who hav not paid anything to the D. M. Bennett fund, ought to raise a fund for our friend, D. M. Bennett, at or near the time of his return from Albany, to be called the D. M. Bennett Reception Fund. As there are many of us who cannot be present on his return let us send our prayer to him in the shape of a little money. Would like to see the names of those who are willing to donate to the reception fund of D. M. Bennett appear from time to time in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The amount that he or she is willing to giv can be stated or not at the time your names are sent in. Kind friends, let us make one grand rally to the D. M. Bennett reception fund, hoping that it may renew his age.

J. T. SMITH.

COLON, MICH., March 18, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I am glad to read in your last issue that there is a move in the right direction, one in which all lovers of liberty will readily say, Amen. There is no act of my life that would do me greater honor than to stand at the door of the Christian bastile and take by the hand the honorable old man, the world's benefactor, as he emerges from durance vile into the sunshine of freedom. "Oh, how I wish I could be there!" is my constant cry. Let thousands go and be there in person and other thousands I know will be there in spirit to manifest their appreciation of him, of the cause for which he has suffered, and their condemnation of the men who placed him there. His name will liv in the memory of all good men and women long after theirs hav passed into oblivion and forgotten.

Yours for truth and freedom, DR. A. J. KINNE.

PORTLANDVILLE, N. Y., March 6, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I am very thankful that I hav at last found a paper that is published in the interests of humanity and freedom. Are you aware that there are thousands of people in this land (who hav no knowledge of the Liberal sentiment of your paper) who are willing and ready to giv it their support, and stand by truth until death? I tell you the waters are disturbed. People are thirsting after truth and freedom of conscience. They must and will hav it. Superstition and slavery must giv way to the light of science and truth. Let us stand to the siege, and do not giv up the fight, for we are in the right. The time for men to stand and show their bravery is when the enemy charges. I tell you, sir, when superstitious priestcraft lays its vile hand upon and points its bloody weapons at the free institutions of this government, procured to us by rivers of blood drawn from our forefathers' veins—I say when it seeks to lay its treacherous, bloody hand upon the freedom of conscience, which should be dearer to man than life itself, it is time for every loyal heart to rally to the standard, and raise the banner of light, truth, and freedom!

For my part, I feel that I am ready to shed the last drop of my blood in defense of liberty of conscience, freedom, and equality to all mankind, regardless of nation, sex, or color. "Love and Equality," is my motto.

I supposed I was nearly alone in the belief of the errors of the Bible and the superstitions of mankind, until I received your paper yesterday, when I was very happy to learn my mistake.

I was invited to deliver a discourse at the Christian praise meeting of this place, a few weeks ago. I ventured to giv them my idea of man and the Bible, for which I hav received slander and hatred by some of my former best friends. But I cannot help it. I feel that truth is preferable to the friendship of man.

A cheerful word to D. M. Bennett. Be of good courage. If you hav done wrong forsake the wrong and go about your duty cheerfully, and you will hav the support of the best men and women that America affords. Your imprisonment will not be detrimental to you and the good cause in the end if you are determined on doing right. My whole heart and sympathy are with you.

Yours truly, PETER SOULE.

Whence Are We?

BY W. P.

The question now is, how our kind
E're came to liv upon the earth?
Hav we evolved, body and mind,
From animals of lower birth?

Religionists file their demur
To Darwin's facts and theories;
Trembling in constant dread and fear
Over their old theologies.

Suppose we hav evolved from monkeys,
And feel ashamed of our ancestors!
Let's try to rise above the donkeys,
Nor hav them longer for our tutors.

Though Balaam's ass rebuked his rider,
And proved him out an arrant fool;
Our modern prophets, like that master,
Still need the donkey's school and rule.

Of all the senses known to man
The common is the most uncommon,
Since every tribe and every class,
From Calvin down to Jo Smith's Mormon.

Are bolstering up their superstition,
Empty, without a ray of science,
Still working grievous imposition,
By follies, lies, and false pretense.

A God scrapes up a little slime,
Forms it into a full-grown man,
Puts him to sleep for the first time,
Carves out a rib and forms a woman.

This silly story, in the eyes
Of all the poor priest-ridden clan,
Kites them above the learned and wise,
And all the truths adorning man.

But now we hope the time's at hand
When brains will move in common sense,
When useful science through our land
Shall dissipate all blind nonsense.

A Saintly Spree.

In ancient days it came to pass,
St. Peter and St. Paul, alas!
Went out, each seated on an ass,
To bum around Jerusalem.

They called at taverns great and small;
First Peter treated, then St. Paul,
Till from their asses both did fall—
These bummers of Jerusalem.

They shout and roar, oh, shame! oh, shame!
And each of them did loudly claim
That Champagne Charlie was his name—
These bawlers of Jerusalem.

At length when they had had enough,
They sat themselves cigars to puff—
And then commenced a-playing bluff,
Those gamblers of Jerusalem.

Two Yanks into the bar-room came,
The one was blind, the other lame;
Says Paul, "Let's play a four-hand game
Of euchre, in Jerusalem,"

He touched the blind and then the lame,
And both of them all right became,
And then sat down to play the game
Called euchre, in Jerusalem.

But both the saints were rather slow,
And with the Yanks they had no show,
For they had come from Chicago
To clean out old Jerusalem.

So Paul and Pete were quickly beat,
And then stuck in to pay the treat;
And both the Yanks took "whisky neat,"
To drink, in old Jerusalem.

They tossed the dice to see who'd pay,
That's much the best and shortest way;
But saints don't toss dice every day,
Not even in Jerusalem.

St. Paul threw first—eighteen he made
(The dice were cogged, I'm much afraid);
"You can't beat that, old man," he said,
"And no one in Jerusalem."

St. Peter muttered, "Sacre bleu."
He took the dice, nineteen he threw!
Says Paul, "Come, that'll do for you,
You fraud of old Jerusalem!"

At length their money all was spent,
And each home to his hash-house went,
And didn't come out till after Lent,
To spree around Jerusalem.

Our Rest.

TO SUSAN H. WIXON.—BY GEORGE LYNN.

Is it true, dear sister, you're weary of earth?
Are its shadows and sorrows so dark and drear
That the spirit and mind, with their priceless worth,
Should pass on to their rest like the dying year?

Hav the battles of life made you sad and faint
Till the royalest gifts are as worthless dross?
Hav life's gains with the sunshine that love will paint
Been as naught compared to its trials and loss?

If so, to my seeming, your thoughts must hav run
In lines strangely fretted, akin to despair,
Whose vapors and mists nearly shrouded the sun
Of your hopes with their doubts and cankering care.

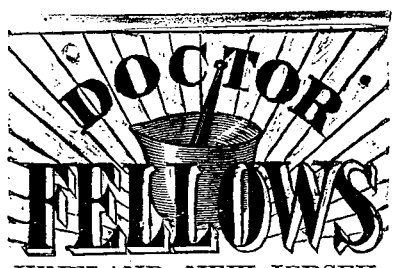
"The birds and the blossoms and stars overhead"
Are some of our teachers, whose beauty sublime
Never hints that inclosed in the realms of the dead
The soul ever sleeps through the annals of time.

I know that these bodies of ours will decay;
That mind, through their medium, will seemingly fail;
That all our externals are passing away
Like the mists of the morn from sunlight and gale;

That weariness comes like the evening shades
To wrap in its mantle the heart and the mind,
And soothes them to rest while the outer world fades
And the soul drops its fetters its freedom to find.

Our earth-life is partly a sketch of the true,
With dark lines, or light, as the picture requires,
While time groups in order each fast-changing view
That nature demands in her constant desires.

The state of the present is simply the shell
Of the spirit that waits its breaking to free
The mind, whose immortal unfoldings shall tell
The life that is waiting for you and for me.



When the earth, with its wrongs, its friendship, and love,
Has answered the use of our spirits that wait
For scenes undiscovered, wherein they may prove
Their boundless resources, their higher estate.

We may know that our loss is a gain in disguise,
That trials and sorrows are lessons we need,
Working out with precision, much to our surprise,
Their uses with death for our lives to succeed.

I pray for the rest that shall bring to the soul
A knowledge of justice and mercy and love,
Where reason shall rule with its welcome control,
While minds vie with minds in haste to approve.

And I steadily trust that time will reveal
The fact that mankind in the future shall be Redeemed from the errors which keenly we feel,
When rest with the truth is the state of the free.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL CIRCULAR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER writes: "Mr. Slenker has been under his (Dr. Fellow's) care for some months; is being treated by him for partial deafness and chronic catarrh, both of which infirmities seem gradually yielding to the doctor's remedies. There is no warmer friend to progress and mental freedom among all the readers of our beloved TRUTH SEEKER than good Dr. Fellows, and if you are afflicted with any of the thousand ills that flesh is heir to, I hope you will one and all giv our Liberal friend an opportunity to make you well again—to render the physical casket a fit receptacle for the jewel of the mind, which is THE ALL that makes us what we are and renders us worthy of the love, admiration, and respect of our kind."

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $1.75.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,

141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Right of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are a liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR in person or by mail FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

JUST OUT!

Another Extraordinary Book!

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth: price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

Author of "The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors," and "Biography of Satan."

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Revelations of Antichrist

CONCERNING

Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read. ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

A Few Words About the Devil,

And Other Biographical Sketches and Essays.

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second edition, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1 25.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him. —The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it —if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 4 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. Joseph Cook says that of all quacks the religious one is the worst. He knows.

IN his last harangue to his Boston disciples, the Rev. Joe Cook told them about a book he had been reading on the cars. "It seemed to me," he said, "that if I had been obliged to devote a week to such literature, I should hav come out of it half idiotic." This suggests an interesting question: What books does the Rev. Joe Cook read before getting off his alleged lectures?

OUR critics wil notis that hereafter the omission of the final e in such words as have, live, and give, and al cases where it follows l ending a word, as in double; the omision of l in such words as wil; the omission of the silent leters; and all doubl letters where but a singl sound is heard are not considered errors. We shall endeavor to assist the practical spelling reformers.—Ness Co. Pioneer.

THUS does a troubled Scotchman vent his grief and sound his alarm concerning the spiritually dilapidated state of his church: "Oh, degenerate church! is there within you no Nehemiah, no Zerubbabel, son of Shealtiel? Are we given over bound to Tatnai and the Apharsachites?" In order to giv his sentiments the widest circulation, he inserts them in the advertising column of a Scotch newspaper. What he wants is to persuade the Established church to stir itself against the prevailing tide which sets in favor of disestablishment.

THE Liberals of New York, with the co-operation of Liberals throughout the country, are preparing to giv Mr. Bennett a fitting reception on his release from prison the last of the present month, the formal reception and ovation to be May 2d. In this demonstration let the thought be kept uppermost that it is one in vindication of the right of free speech, and in no way involves the merits or demerits of particular subjects. It was the freedom of speech and of the press that was assailed in Mr. Bennett's prosecution, and that alone is to be vindicated —Rational Appeal.

IT is difficult to discern the difference between the prosecution of Denis Kearney in California, for using "incendiary language," and the prosecution of the Socialists in Germany, for exercising the right of free discussion. It is also difficult to discern the difference in principle between the hereditary despotism and the alliance with the Romish church, which in Germany suppresses socialistic clubs and newspapers, and the money despotism built upon profits from Chinese semi-servile labor, which in California suppresses protest against the pauperization of American labor; and we might add, church despotism which suppresses free speech in the person of D. M. Bennett. Despotism is the same monster born of selfishness under whatever guise it appears.—Appeal.

FATHER OLIVER, of the Dominican order in Paris, recently offered to wager a certain sum of money that the present government of France would not last until 1890. M. Sarcey, the Paris journalist, took him up, but Father Olliver declined then to make the wager, giving three excuses for his refusal; first, that the so-called wager was a mere rhetorical flourish, such as is excusable in a preacher, and is never taken in earnest by his hearers; secondly, that he never intended to predict that the French republic would not endure ten years longer, but merely that the government of M. de Freycinet would not last until 1890; thirdly, that the strict rules of the Dominican order prohibit him from betting. M. Sarcey is reported as saying that such a reply is all he wanted, as it suffices to show what degree of credit may be placed in the bragging rhetoric of political preachers.

THE St. Louis branch of the Society for the Suppression of Vice had a stormy session April 2d which lasted late and came near breaking up in a row. The meeting was held in St. John's Methodist church, in an ultra-fashionable neighborhood of the western suburbs. Both Anthony Comstock and agent McAfee were present. In the course of his remarks Mr. Comstock said the poisonous influences he was fighting had crept into that neighborhood, and people had been forced to move because of the dreaded contamination. He became very pointed in his observations, and said that it had been discovered that a ten-year-old daughter of a prominent member of that very church had been guilty of vicious indulgences with the boys of the neighbors. The pastor of the church, Rev. Dr. Wilson arose, and fairly quivering with indignation, denounced the statements and reflected on Mr. Comstock. The latter responded in language almost equally strong. Then fuel was added by the declaration that obscene literature was being circulated in the Stoddard school, the pet educational institution of the vicinity. The controversy extended upon this statement until it looked as if the meeting would break up in confusion. After adjournment an attempt was made to suppress any publication or these violent proceedings.

IN another column will be found the advertisement of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a sixteen-page paper, the size of Harper's Weekly, and the organ of the Liberal Leagues of the country. These Leagues are formed to oppose the intervention of the church in the affairs of state—to foster and protect Freethought and discussion on all subjects. They hav been made necessary by the action of the Y. M. C. A. of late years through its tool called "The Society for the Suppression of Vice," whose active agent is Anthony Comstock, of infamous notoriety. This Society boasts that it will stop the publication and sale of all books and papers not approved by the church. It has already gone a long way to do it. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, D. M. Bennett, Esq., is now in the penitentiary at Albany, N. Y., serving out a thirteen months' sentence for sending a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" through the mail to this stool-pigeon Comstock, who applied under an assumed name. This book is a treatise on the evils that hav crept into our social system, and is in no sense a harmful one, but on the contrary contains valuable suggestions. We hav read it, and with profit. Mr. Bennett's sentence will expire on the 29th inst. His host of friends are going to giv him a reception in Chickering Hall on the evening of May 2d. We hope it will be such an ovation as will teach Comstock and his crew that their attempt to crush out free speech and free press in this country will be a huge failure. —Greenback-Labor Chronicle.

IN the city of New York there is an organization known as the "Society for the Suppression of Vice," whose headquarters are at the central Young Men's Christian Association rooms of that city. The work of this Society through its agent Anthony Comstock (who has gained a national reputation), consists in the suppression of obscene books and publications through the United States mail, as well as the abolition of other forms of vice and immorality as far as lies within the scope of the society (the necessity of which no one will doubt, or whose motive impugn), has been perverted in a certain direction, and instead of falling down, and hounding out publishers of obscene and abominable literature, it has been, through its agent, waging a war against leading Liberals and Infidel writers and speakers. This is distinctly against the boasted principle of free speech, and no later than three weeks ago agent Comstock received a scathing review from the pen of a prominent Baptist divine of New York for the course he was pursuing. The case in point will illustrate the course agent Comstock is pursuing. Over a year ago some trouble was occasioned at Irwin Station, from Prof. B. F. Underwood, a noted Liberal orater of Boston, delivering an address at that place. One or two ministers and a number of church members turned out en masse and behaved in a riotous manner at the schoolhouse where Prof. Underwood was lecturing before the Irwin Liberal League. The difficulties of that night culminated in several law suits against Prof. Underwood and several prominent citizens of Irwins, among others William Crookstone, Esq. The case came up recently in Greensburg before Judge Hunter. The Society for the Prevention and Suppression of Vice in New York, through its agent, Comstock, we are reliably informed, has put up the money for the carrying on of the suit against Prof. Underwood, and this would seem to be verified in the fact that Mr. Comstock was in our neighboring town of Scottdale recently. Great interest centers around the case from the fact that D. M. Bennett, of New York, has written a life of Comstock, while Prof. Underwood is noted as a scholar and brilliant writer. It seems small business for a Christian society to hound down and persecute in an underhand way men of education and intellect simply because they entertain different views from those embraced by their orthodox brethren. Such seems to be the course of the Vice Society.—Mt. Pleasant Times.

THE Providence Conference of Methodists, which during the last week has been holding its fortieth annual session at Norwich, Conn., has under investigation very grave charges against three ministers who hav heretofore been looked upon as model, moral, and zealous propagators of the faith and extremely good citizens. The derelict clergymen are Revs. Charles E. Walker, A. L. Dearing, and A. W. Paige. Mr. Walker's case is still fresh in the recollection of the public, having come to the surface only a few months since. In the case of Rev. A. W. Paige, lately in charge of a church in South Glastonbury, it will be remembered that he was arrested a few months since for sustaining alleged improper relations with Miss Susan Gates of East Hampton. Mr. Paige, who is sixty years of age, during his former pastorate at East Hampton, it is alleged, had become acquainted with Miss Gates, one of his congregation, and was often seen in her company. After his removal to South Glastonbury the intimacy was continued, and it was the reverend gentleman's frequent recreation to walk to East Hampton, a distance of about sixteen miles, and spend the evening in her society. He then, it is further alleged, would retrace his steps toward home, which he succeeded in reaching before daybreak. This infatuation on the part of the sexagenarian lasted until an obstacle impeded it. This obstacle was the girl's brother, who intercepted a letter from the minister to his sister. The letter was so peculiarly worded that the brother determined upon interviewing the minister upon the nature of its contents. He met the minister the next day on his way to his (Gates's) house, and the interview was held. There were only three present—the minister, the brother, and a revolver. The dominie was forced to make a partial confession. The next day Paige was taken before a justice of the peace and, pleading guilty of improper conduct, was fined $7 and costs and sentenced to the county jail at Haddam for thirty days, which sentence expired some time in January last. On his release he was re-arrested by the United States authorities on a charge of sending improper matter through the mails. The letter upon which the accusation was based was the one intercepted by the brother. It contained a rough drawing of the most vulgar character. Mr. Paige was then confined in the Hartford jail awaiting an examination before United States Commissioner Marvin. While Paige was pining in jail his wife discovered a number of letters written by him to Miss Gates. Up to that time Mrs. Paige had believed the one-sided story which had been current in the neighborhood of East Hampton; viz., that the girl had been betrayed by her husband, and that all relations between them had ceased, although at that time Miss Gates was thirty-five years of age. Upon reading these letters, and discovering that they were full of Christian sentiments, she sent them to East Hampton to convince the people that there were two sides to the case, and that the whole matter was an intrigue, in which her husband was no worse than the girl. The disclosure of the letters put a new phase upon the affair, and Miss Gates, whose mind had become affected, was at once hurried off to the state insane hospital at Middletown, where she still remains. The investigation in the Paige case, which has been conducted by the Providence Conference with the utmost secrecy, was terminated to-day by an announcement from the Chairman of the Committee of Inquiry which has had the case under consultation. He stated that the Committee of Ten had found the charge and specifications preferred against him to be true, and recommended his expulsion from the Conference. An elderly preacher made a motion that the black record of this man's crime be destroyed, that it might not be a blot on the record of the Conference for the inspection of future generations. This motion was not seconded. Bishop Bowman remarked that Rev. A. W. Paige had the right of appeal, and that it was not well to destroy the evidence before it was known what course was to be taken by the accused. He thought the Secretary should file the evidence as a part of the record of the Conference. The report was then accepted and the recommendation adopted.

Will the Coming Man Worship God?

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.—CONCLUDED.

Just in proportion as men cease to regard God as a being possessing qualities like themselves, will they cease to worship and to find that consolation in communion with God that is the joy and the boast of the devotee. How can he find satisfaction in communing with something of which he can have no conception, and between which and himself there may be nothing in common?

"I am," says Henry James, "constrained by every inspiration of true manhood to demand for my worship a perfectly human deity, who is so intent upon rescuing every creature he has made from the everlasting death and damnation he bears about in himself, as finitely constituted, as not to shrink, if need be, from humbling himself to every patient form of ignominy, and feeding contentedly year in and year out, century after century, and millennium after millennium, upon the literal breath of man" (Substance and Shadow, p. 495).

That is the kind of God that the worshiper demands, and which alone can satisfy the strong religious nature. But that is the kind of God of which there is no proof, of which there is proof to the contrary, and belief in which is fast fading out of intellectual minds. And the man who has outgrown belief in a personal, intelligent, anthropomorphic being—a being possessing a nature like his own—has outgrown the desire and need of worship, except so far as the lingering tendencies produced by ages of religious devotion in his ancestors assert themselves when the beliefs that caused them have been cast aside.

Since worship began with the conception of personality and intelligence outside of man that could be placated and pleased, when the belief in such personality and intelligence disappears worship must also cease. No doubt, as Mr. John Fiske maintains, the purification and refinement of Theism consists in a continuous process of "deanthropomorphization," discarding the human qualities with which man has invested deity. But as Theism commenced by ascribing natural phenomena to personality and intelligence, and has always recognized them as the essential attributes of deity, when they are discarded, when it is affirmed that we cannot philosophically believe in a personal intelligent being as the cause of phenomena, the essential element of Theism is abandoned, and worship is no longer possible. When Mr. Fiske purifies and refines Theism by the total abolition of every anthropomorphic element, he simply purifies and refines God out of existence, at least deprives him of every quality that has had or can have any interest for the worshiper. In affirming the existence of absolute reality, self-existent and eternal, and "of which all phenomena, as presented in consciousness, are manifestations, but which we can only know through these manifestations," the "cosmic Theist," as Mr. Fiske calls himself, postulates that only which is common to Theism and Atheism, and which is more appropriately represented by the algebraic $x$ than by the word God.

Since the God of the worshiper must have qualities, and psychical qualities such as man is conscious of possessing, Mr. Fiske's cosmic Theism can afford no consolation to the religious worshiper. Imagine the devotee attempting to reconcile the duty and delight of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving with sentences like these:

"For to represent the deity as a person who thinks, contrives, and legislates, is simply to represent him as a product of evolution. The definition of intelligence being 'the continuous adjustment of specialized inner relations to specialized outer relations,' it follows that to represent the deity as intelligent is to surround deity with an environment, and thus to destroy its infinity and its self-existence" (Cosmic Philosophy, vol. ii, p. 394–5).

"In ascribing intelligence to unembodied spirit we are either using meaningless jargon or we are implicitly surrounding unembodied spirit with an environment of some kind, and are thus declaring it to be both limited and dependent" (Ibid, p. 396.)

"It is not that the environment has been adapted to the organism by an exercise of creative intelligence and beneficence, but it is that the organism is necessarily fitted to the environment because the fittest survive" (p. 398).

"It is not the intelligence which has made the environment, but it is the environment which has moulded the intelligence" (p. 402).

"If there exist a personal creator of the universe who is infinitely intelligent and powerful, he cannot be infinitely good; and if, on the other hand, he be infinite in goodness, then he must be lamentably finite in power or in intelligence" (p. 405).

"With Mr. Mill, therefore, 'I will call no being good who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow-creatures.' And, going a step further, I will add that it is impossible to call that being good who, existing prior to the phenomenal universe, and creating it out of the plenitude of infinite power and foreknowledge, endowed it with such properties that its material and moral development must inevitably be attended by the misery of untold millions of sentient creatures for whose existence their creator is ultimately responsible. In short, there can be no hypothesis of a moral government of the world which does not implicitly assert an immoral government. As soon as we seek to go beyond the process of evolution disclosed by science, and posit an external agency which is in the slightest degree anthropomorphic, we are obliged either to supplement and limit this agency by a second one that is diabolic, or else to include elements of diabolism in the character of the first agency itself" (p. 408).

"Personality and infinity are terms expressive of ideas which are mutually incompatible. The pseud-idea 'infinite person' is neither more nor less unthinkable than the pseud-idea 'circular triangle.' As Spinoza somewhere says, 'Determinatio negatio est'—to define God is to deny him; and such being the case, what can be more irrational than to insist upon thought and volition, phenomena only known to exist within quite narrow limitations as the very nature and essence of the Infinite Deity" (page 408–9).

How evident that Mr. Fiske's "Divine Power," as he occasionally ventures to characterize the "unknowable," without goodness, without personality, without intelligence, can never be an object of interest to the religious worshiper! Anticipating the obvious criticisms, Mr. Fiske says that "it will doubtless be urged that such religion is too abstract, too coldly scientific, to have any general influence upon action, and can therefore be of no practical value. . . . And it will moreover be asserted, with vehemence, that in place of a father whom men can love and venerate, we are giving them a mere philosophical formula, calling for no warmer feeling than calm, intellectual assent. Granting that our doctrine is philosophically the reverse of Atheism, it will be urged that here extremes meet, and that an infinite and therefore unknowable God is practically equivalent to no God at all" (p. 468–9).

In reply to this criticism, Mr. Fiske reminds his readers that "the early Christians were called Atheists by their pagan adversaries;" that "as we proceed to take away, one by one, the attributes which limit deity and enable it to be classified, we seem, no doubt, to be destroying it altogether;" yet "the symbolization of deity indicated by the profoundest scientific analysis of to-day is as practically real as the symbolization which has resulted from the attempts of antiquity to perform such an analysis, and is in every way more satisfactory alike to head and heart" (p. 469).

This reply cannot be satisfactory to either the careful thinker or the religious devotee. There was no logical or verbal propriety in calling the early Christians Atheists, because they recognized in God that which is the very essence of Theism, personality and intelligence, and the contemplation of which as the cause of phenomena was the beginning of Theism; but the terminal phase of stripping deity of anthropomorphic qualities does not simply purify and refine the conception of deity, but divests it of its essential nature, that with which it originated, upon which it is based, and without which prayer, praise, and adoration to God were a mere farce. And it may be added that no amount of scientific culture will ever prepare the people for, or induce them to accept, the "unknowable" or the "unconditioned" as an object of reverence and worship in the place of a personal intelligent deity. When a mind becomes sufficiently emancipated from theology, and sufficiently advanced to appreciate and accept the philosophy which Mr. Fiske has so admirably expounded, it will lose all disposition to worship an unseen being, unless, indeed, it be with him as Strauss says of Schleiermacher, with whom "prayer was the expression of a conscious illusion, partly the result of early habit, partly in view of the congregation which surrounded him; and he intentionally avoided lifting himself above it by his critical consciousness" (Old Faith and New, p. 129).

"But," says Mr. Fiske, "what men have worshiped from the earliest times has been, not the known, but the unknown. Even the primeval savage, who worshiped plants and animals, worshiped them only so far as their modes of action were mysterious to him, only in so far as they constituted a part of the weird, uninterpreted world by which he was surrounded. As soon as he had generalized the dynamic phenomena presented by the plant or the animal—that is, as soon as it became an object of knowledge—it ceased to be an object of worship. . . . Though theology has all along wrestled with the insoluble problems presented by this supreme mystery, and, by insisting on divers tangible propositions concerning it, has implicitly asserted that it can be at least partially known, the fact remains that only by being unknown has it continued to be the object of the religious sentiment" (Cosmic Philosophy, vol. ii, p. 421).

But this paragraph fails to state the whole truth, or the most important one, in connection with the subject treated.

That which is an object of worship is that which the worshiper believes he understands, so far as it has interest for him. He worships a personal intelligence, the operations of which he firmly believes he observes, and which he constantly compares with the processes of which he is himself conscious. It is his own qualities and not the "unknowable" that become the object of his devotion. Just so far as he ascribes his own good qualities to God he loves him, and so far as his God is regarded as bad he fears him. It is true there is a mystery, but the devotee believes that his religion solves it. As Herbert Spencer says:

"For though every religion, setting out as it does with the tacit assertion of a mystery, forthwith proceeds to give some solution of this mystery, and so asserts that it is not a mystery passing human comprehension" (First Principles, p. 45).

That which is mysterious to the philosopher or the man of science seems perfectly clear to the devotee. He is confident he understands, where the thinker is in doubt. If he worship a fetich, he does so confident that he knows its disposition. His gods are real, conceivable beings, more or less like himself; and, although with the growth of intelligence mysteries arise in connection with the deities, they are the result of speculation, and are an unessential accompaniment, not the objective basis, of religion. It is as a philosopher and not as a religious devotee that man dwells on and gives prominence to the mysteries of the universe.

When man comes to see that the ultimate source of phenomena is unknowable, that it is useless to attempt to form any conception of it, that he cannot properly predicate of it even goodness or intelligence, it must cease to be an object of religious sentiment.

As soon as an object became known to the worshiper, "it ceased to be an object of worship," for the very obvious reason that it ceased to be what it had appeared to be—what it was believed to be when it was worshiped. When it was worshiped, it was not the mysteriousness of its nature but the qualities with which it was invested, and its supposed power to benefit or injure man, that constituted the object of religious interest. Now, when it is seen that the qualities with which the unknowable has been invested cannot be properly ascribed to it, and that nothing is or can be known in regard to it, it must certainly cease to be an object of religious sentiment. True, when it reaches the ultimate mystery, "science must ever reverently pause, acknowledging the presence of the mystery of mysteries;" but when science pauses and philosophy acknowledges the inability of the mind to penetrate further, the "cosmic Theist" claims that the unknown and unknowable will be the object of his religion! But such a religion can have adherents only among those who have reasoned themselves out of the belief in an anthropomorphic deity, but in whose minds there yet linger religious influences which have been inherited and strengthened by education and surroundings. With the surrender of anthropomorphism, the disappearance of the religion of "cosmic Theism" is only a matter of time. It will never touch the practical life of man nor produce a ripple on the current of religious thought. Mr. Fiske I recognize as one of the most profound and clear-headed thinkers this country has produced, and his exposition of the philosophy of Herbert Spencer shows ability of a high order; but by his own religious feelings, or some other cause, he has been betrayed into inconsistencies on the subject, to which I have referred, that appear in strange contrast to his generally lucid and logical treatment of philosophical questions.

Undoubtedly the sentiment of devotion which has been attached to the conception of a personal, intelligent deity will be greatly modified, as we know it is in individual instances, with a decline of belief in such a being; but its object must be in the future what it has been in the past—man—with this difference, that whereas in the past man has worshiped, unawares, his own nature in an imagined objective being, in proportion as this illusion is discovered he will make his intellectual and moral nature the direct object of his love and devotion, and the improvement of his race, not the glory of God, the object of his efforts. Theology will give way to anthropology, the worship of God to the contemplation of humanity and to the realization of noble ideals, by the recognition and cultivation in man of all that is lofty and grand in the theological conceptions of God.

"It may not be consonant to usage," says John Stuart Mill, "to call this religion; but the term, so applied, has a meaning, and one which is not adequately expressed by any other word. Candid persons of all creeds may be willing to admit that if a person has an ideal object, his attachment and sense of duty toward which are able to control and discipline all his other sentiments and propensities, and prescribe to him a rule of life, that person has a religion. . . . Many, indeed, may be unable to believe that this object is capable of gathering around it feelings sufficiently strong; but this is exactly the point on which a doubt can hardly remain in an intelligent reader of Comte; and we join him in contemning, as equally irrational and mean, the conception of human nature as incapable of giving its love and devoting its existence to any object which cannot afford in exchange an eternity of personal enjoyment" (Auguste Comte and Positivism, p. 122).

"With the general tenor of this passage," says Fiske, after quoting the above passage from Mill, "I heartily agree. I have no sympathy with those critics who maintain that the idea of humanity is an unworthy idea, incapable of calling forth to a high degree our sentiments of devotion and reverence. . . . We may still further admit that all morality may be summed up in the disinterested service of the race, such being, as already shown, . . . the fundamental principle of the ethical philosophy which is based on the doctrine of evolution. And it is, moreover, easy to sympathize with the feelings which led Comte formally to consecrate the memories of the illustrious dead, whose labors have made us what we are—that 'communion of saints, unseen not yet unreal,' as Carlyle nobly expresses it, 'whose heroic sufferings rise up melodiously together into heaven, out of all times and out of all lands, as a sacred miserere; their heroic actions, also, as a boundless, everlasting psalm of triumph.' This intense feeling of the community of the human race, this 'enthusiasm of humanity,' as the author of 'Ecce Homo' calls it, forms a very considerable part of Christianity when stripped of its mythology, and is one of the characteristics which chiefly serve to difference the world-religion of Jesus and Paul from the ethnic religions of antiquity" (Cosmic Philosophy, pp. 418, 419).

It is not necessary that we accept all the views of Comte in regard to making "the human race, conceived as a continuous whole," the object of religious devotion, such as he insists on, or approve his scheme of retaining the forms and symbols of exploded or decaying systems of religion; but the essential idea of his system—that in the future the elements of excellence in man will take the place of an anthropomorphic being as the highest object of man's reverence and love—is in perfect accord with our views as to the tendency and ultimate end of the development and modification of the religious sentiment. Unreasoning worship of an invisible Being will give way to a recognition of man's powers and possibilities, intellectual and moral, and to an "enthusiasm of humanity" which will inspire him with noble sentiments and give a grandeur to human life. But such a change must be slow and gradual. It can take place no faster than philosophic criticism and scientific culture undermine faith in anthropomorphism, and substitute in its place those broader views of nature which Mr. Fiske has so ably set forth.

I conclude that the coming man will not worship God, but that the time, money, devotion, and enthusiasm which in the past have been lavished on an imaginary being will in the future be given to the improvement and elevation of the human race.

A Letter from Bro. Smith.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I clip the following article from the Detroit Evening News:

CHICAGO DISGUSTED AT TWO PARDONS BY HAYES.

Considerable public disgust is expressed here over the pardon by the President of Gregg and Golsen, two of the embezzlers from the money order department of the Chicago post-office. Golsen was released yesterday (April 1st) after nine months' imprisonment, the only one condition being the payment of $1,230 fine. Gregg, who has been confined only three months, is not to be released until his fine of $1 218 is arranged for. It is not believed that either fine will ever be collected.

Now, I fully agree with Mrs. Hayes—I mean Mr. Hayes—that it's better to pardon a man for stealing than to pardon a man for selling "Cupid's Yokes." Steal one, steal all if you will, but don't sell "Cupid's Yokes." Don't sell any obscene book that hain't got "holy" stamped on its cover. So say I, and so says Mrs. Hayes—I mean Mr. Hayes. I'll hav great respect for a petition with half a dozen signatures asking the pardon of a man who has embezzled the funds of the government. Yes, he shall hav pardon, but never! no, never, will I respect a petition with 200,000 signatures of respectable citizens who ask for the pardon of a man who has sold "Cupid's Yokes!" So say I, and so say the clergy and our President, Mrs. Hayes. (I keep saying Mrs. Hayes when I mean Mr. Hayes.) Steal if you will, but don't, oh, don't sell that fifteen-cent book called "Cupid's Yokes," except it be stamped "holy" on the cover. J. Smith.

Liberalism Booming in Indiana.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav spoken in ten different counties in Indiana within the last three weeks, and it is really cheering to observe how rapidly the tide of Infidelity is rising in this state. I hav spoken in Howard, Tipton, Cass, Miami, Marshall, St. Joseph, Noble, Steuben, and De Kalb counties, and generally to large audiences, some of whom came in some cases many miles. I everywhere met warm friends. My first two Liberal lectures were at Tipton, where are some noble workers, in the persons of Mr. Richardson, W. C. Baker, and old father A. B. Baugh. A diseased condition of my vocal organs somewhat impaired my delivery in that place, but I soon partially recovered. At Walton I found a live Liberal, in the person of David Engler, keeper of the hotel, and a kind and genial companion. I visited Peru, Rochester, Plymouth, Walkerton, Rome City, Ligonier, Waterloo, etc. At Rome City I had a preacher and an editor out to hear me, with whom by invitation I had an interview. At several places they hav taken steps to organize a Liberal League, but few organizations of that character are yet completed.

I hav appointed W. J. Allen, of Rome City, on the state committee. He is a worker, and an able one. At Ligonier I had no meeting. The notice was too late. But such men as N. Zent and A. C. Hardenbrook will keep the cause alive there. Nearly everywhere I hav spoken, my lectures hav been highly applauded, and the friends expressed themselves as highly pleased. Those who want my services as a Liberal League or Freethough lecturer will address me soon at Richmond, Indiana. Kersey Graves.

Liberal League Notes.

Mr. James Leach writes under date of March 30th that an auxiliary League has just been organized in Darlington, Wis., and a charter ordered.

I am pleased to learn that Prof. Rawson, the efficient secretary of the National Liberal League, is recovering from his long and severe illness, and is now able to attend to the duties of his office.

Mr. L. V. Kennedy, the postmaster of Fair View, Red Willow Co., Nebraska, is organizing a League in his town. The requisite number of names are obtained to the call, and a charter will be ordered soon. Mr. G. L. Clark of Vermont, who has been stopping in Fair View for some time, has been circulating Liberal papers and documents, and has done very much to bring about the organization of this League.

Mr. C. H. Dunning, of Marcellus, who represents Michigan on the Executive Committee of the N. L. L., reports that the prospects now are that a number of Leagues will soon be organized in Michigan, and he thinks it will not be long before that state will stand second, at least, in the list of states as regards the number of Leagues. Each Liberal of Michigan will please send his name and thirty cents in postage stamps to Bro. Dunning immediately.

Each member of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League is earnestly requested to make a short report of the Liberal League work being done in the state he represents to the Chairman of the Committee immediately after he reads this request, and a like report thereafter during the year on the first of every month. This report should be condensed as much as possible so that it can be published in the Liberal papers.

The Board of Directors of the N. L. L. is making an effort to get all the vacancies on the Executive Committee filled with live working men. The Board has recently appointed on the Committee A. J. Oliver for Florida, Clayton Crosson for Kentucky, M. C. Wood for Minnesota, Paul Gariepy for Nevada, T. L. Guery for Georgia, and Willis McDannald for Washington territory. Most of the present members are doing all that it is possible for them to do. A very few of them are not as energetic as the cause demands. Liberals of each state, stand by your committee man.

Kersey Graves writes: "I am out on the ocean of theological reform with my sails all spread. I hav got the ball to rolling. I hav been out a week and visited five points, and hav rekindled the fires upon the altar. At first I was encumbered with some difficulty in speaking, growing out of a bronchial disturbance, but it has nearly left me, and I now succeed in kindling an interest in the minds of my audiences beyond any former experience." From what I learn I judge Bro. Graves is shortly to become as popular as a Liberal platform speaker as he has been for many years a Liberal writer. He should be kept constantly in the field where he can "let his light shine."

I was pleased to learn from a letter I just received from Prof. A. L. Rawson that many of the leading Hebrews of this country are friends of the League movement. I take the liberty of quoting the following sentence from a letter that the distinguished Rabbi Isaac M. Wise has written to Prof. Rawson: "Permit me to state at once that I am in full sympathy with the work of the Liberal League, and will gladly open the columns of the American Israelite to a Liberal discussion of its principles and propositions." Prof. Rawson makes the very proper suggestion that "here is a new channel which we must try and profit by. We should ask some of our best writers to improve the opportunity. The Hebrews are a thrifty class, growing in numbers, and rising into importance by their reform movements of which Felix Adler's is a type." And I will add that I believe there is no better class of citizens than those of the Hebrew persuasion. But few of them are found in our jails, and none in our porhoouses. The Christians hav given them a bad name as they hav everybody else who does not swear by their shibboleth. I think most of this class of citizens are in favor of the entire separation of church and state.

Paul Gariepy, of Gold Hill, state of Nevada, who has just been appointed to represent that state on the Executive Committee, and who has for a long time been doing good missionary work, writes: "I had the great pleasure of hearing Col. Ingersoll deliver his matchless lecture on 'The Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child,' when he came to this coast three years ago. Lately the San Francisco Chronicle published his lecture, delivered at Rochester, N. Y., and two weeks later the same paper gave us his lecture on Thomas Paine, delivered at Chicago, and, although the Chronicle published an edition of thousands of extra copies, these were soon exhausted and another large edition was required to supply the demand. So you see from this that Freethought is making a good deal of progress here. Should Col. Ingersoll come to this coast again to lecture he would hav still larger audiences than when he was here before. I hav just read D. M. Bennett's dream in The Truth Seeker of the 13th inst., and I think it the best dream I ever read. I hope he will continue to dream on until he makes the church wish they had let him alone. It seems all the gods but Jehovah are in favor of his new book! Good! Now let the Liberals all subscribe and make it a success. I was sorry to read in The Truth Seeker that Bro. E. Campfield, who is doing so much for the cause, had to bear the expenses which his large correspondence necessitates almost alone. The Liberals should remember that the munitions of war must be furnished those who are giving their time, strength, and talents to the good cause, if we would succeed. There are a great many Liberals like myself who possess but little talents and education, and who are consequently unable to write for the papers or deliver lectures, yet who might do a great deal of good by contributing their mite to those who are fighting in the front ranks for the good of humanity. A few weeks since I received fourteen copies of the good old Investigator from Mrs. Ruth Brettelle, of Rochester, N. Y. I hope some of them will be instrumental in opening the eyes of some of the hell-fearing followers of the Lamb." I fear my good friend is too modest and puts too low an estimate on his qualifications. If we had more like him it would be a great advantage to humanity. H. L. Green,

Spiritualism.

The Spiritualists and Liberals of western New York met in Sons of Temperance Hall, Rochester, Wednesday at 2 P.M., in recognition of the anniversary of modern Spiritualism.

The meeting was called to order by the President, and Mrs. Gardner, of Rochester appointed Secretary.

A Committee on Resolutions were chosen by the President, consisting of Mr. Gregory, Mr. Chaplin, Mrs. Emma Taylor, and Mrs. Cornelia Gardner.

The afternoon session was spent in conference and the reading of an intensely interesting spirit communication by Mrs. Colby, given by her hand automatically.

Adjourned for refreshments and social visiting in the hall.

The meeting opened at 7 o'clock by the reading of the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, We Spiritualists and Liberals of Lockport and vicinity, meeting in recognition of this, the thirty second anniversary of modern Spiritualism, not only deprecate but condemn the attitude of the churches toward all reformers outside the pale of their respective communions, allowing no place for us as believers in immortality and spirit intercommunion to giv an expression of our belief; therefore

Resolved, That as Spiritualists and Free Religionists, we will unite to break down old superstitions, based upon the creedal dogmas of an effete theology, that has outlived its usefulness, and is rapidly sinking of its own dead weight, like other relics of old barbaric days, into a hopeless oblivion.

Resolved, That as the time has come when the why's and wherefore's are questioned, we ask why we are compelled to pay taxes upon millions' of dollars worth of church property, held ostensibly to worship God in, but practically as a place where the privileged few may meet from time to time to listen to the teachings of ecclesiasticism based upon man's creeds, and superstitions, and enjoy operatic music of paid "men and women singers," and witness the brilliant achievements in toilets of Christian worshipers, while the true gospel of a humanitarian religion is entirely overlooked, and the teachings of the humble Nazarene a bitter mockery with such surroundings, and rendering it too expensive an article for the poor to enjoy.

Resolved, That as avant-coureurs of the incoming dispensation of the religion of humanity, we welcome our faithful co-laborers Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith to this field, whitened for the harvest, and present the thanks of this convention to them, as a token of our fellowship and hearty good will.

Resolutions accepted and adopted.

By request Mrs. Taylor spoke of the anniversary as that of a period commenced that characterizes the phenomena of spirit intercourse on a more physical plane, that has grown into vast proportions of fine inspiration and spiritual character, and bearing incontrovertible evidence of life beyond.

Mrs. Colby's subject was, "The Age of Progress in which We Live." Man lives to-day in an age of investigation; he has weighed anchor upon the vast unknown sea of knowledge, where everything is ready for his investigations, from sand-grain to perfected planet, and from fire-mist to souls of men.

No nation, to time no age, but has had those Spiritualistic manifestations. The Bible is full of it, from the "Voice of God" in the garden to John in Patmos, who was emphatically told the angel was of his brethren the prophets, one like himself.

Can you find a record of modern manifestations more startling than of Saul and the woman of Endor? What minister dare say it is not true? Not one. Did she tell the truth? Who dares deny that? And God declares "that which has been, shall be, and that which is to be hath already been. God requires the things that are past." And if these manifestations hav been, they are required and must be manifest to-day.

We can giv only a few scattered thoughts, beautifully expressed, bearing also a beautiful tribute to our sister, Mrs. Penfield, just passed from our mortal vision into that higher life of everlasting progress.

The audience listened in silence for nearly two hours, and the meeting adjourned to meet at our next anniversary.

Mrs. Colby goes to Rochester, where her services will commence next Sabbath, probably at Odd Fellows' Temple.

The entire meeting was a success, financially and spiritually. Cornelia Garnder, Cor. Sec.

The Chinese Religion.

To the Editor of the Chicago Times: To-day Messrs. Wright, Dickey, O'Connor, and Murch, of the select committee on the causes of the present depression of labor, presented the majority a special report upon Chinese immigration.

These gentlemen are in great fear for the future of our most holy and perfectly authenticated religion, and hav, like faithful watchmen, from the walls and towers of Zion, hastened to giv the alarm. They hav informed Congress that "Joss has his temple of worship in the Chinese quarters in San Francisco. Within the walls of a dilapidated structure is exposed to the view of the faithful the god of the Chinaman, and here are his altars of worship. Here he tears up his pieces of paper; here he offers up his prayers; here he receives his religious consolations, and here is his road to the celestial land." That "Joss is located in a long, narrow room in a building in a back alley, upon a kind of altar;" that "he is a wooden image, looking as much like an alligator as like a human being;" that the Chinese "think there is such a place as heaven;" that "all classes of Chinamen worship idols;" that "the temple is open every day at all hours;" that "the Chinese hav no Sunday;" that this heathen god has "huge jaws, a big red tongue, large white teeth, a half-dozen arms, and big, fiery eyeballs. About him are placed offerings of meat and other eatables—a sacrificial offering."

The world is also informed by these gentlemen that "idolatry of the Chinese produces a demoralizing effect upon our American youth by bringing sacred things into disrespect, and making religion a theme of disgust and contempt."

In San Francisco there are some three hundred thousand people. Is it possible that a few Chinese can bring our "holy religion" into disgust and contempt? In that city there are fifty times as many churches as joss-houses. Scores of sermons are uttered every week;" religious books and papers are plentiful as leaves in autumn, and somewhat dryer; thousands of Bibles are within the reach of all. And there, too, is the example of a Christian city.

Why should we send missionaries to China if we can not convert the heathen when they come here? When missionaries go to a foreign land, the poor, benighted people hav to take their word for the blessings showered upon a Christian people; but when the heathen come here they can see for themselves. What was simply a story becomes a demonstrated fact. They come in contact with people who love their enemies. They see that in a Christian land men tell the truth; that they will not take advantage of strangers; that they are just and patient, kind and tender; that they never resort to force; that they hav no prejudice on account of color, race, or religion; that they look upon mankind as brethren; that they speak of God as a universal father, and are willing to work, and even to suffer, for the good not only of their own countrymen, but of the heathen as well. All this the Chinese see and know, and why they still cling to the religion of their country is to me a matter of amazement.

We all know that the disciples of Jesus do unto others as they would that others should do unto them, and that those of Confucius do not unto others anything that they would not that others should do unto them. Surely such people ought to liv together in perfect peace.

Rising with the subject, growing heated with a kind of holy indignation, these Christian representatives of a Christian people most solemnly declare that "Any one who is really endowed with a correct knowledge of our religious system, which acknowledges the existence of a living God and an accountability to him, and a future state of reward and punishment, who feels that he has an apology for this abominable pagan worship, is not a fit person to be ranked as a good citizen of the American Union. It is absurd to make an apology for its toleration. It must be abolished, and the sooner the decree goes forth by the power of this government, the better it will be for the interests of this land."

I take this, the earliest opportunity, to inform these gentlemen composing a majority of the committee that we hav in the United States no "religious system;" that this is a secular government; that it has no religious creed; that it does not believe nor disbelieve in a future state of reward and punishment; that it neither affirms nor denies the existence of a "living God;" and that the only god, so far as this government is concerned, is the legally expressed will of a majority of the people. Under our flag the Chinese hav the same right to worship a wooden god that you hav to worship any other. The Constitution protects equally the church of Jehovah and the house of Joss. Whatever their relative positions may be in heaven, they stand upon a perfect equality in the United States. This government is an Infidel government. We hav a Constitution with man put in and God left out; and it is the glory of this country that we hav such a Constitution.

Our religion can only be brought into contempt by the actions of those who profess to be governed by its teachings. This report will do more in that direction than millions of Chinese could do by burning pieces of paper before a wooden image. If you wish to impress the Chinese with the value of your religion, of what you are pleased to call "the American system," show them that Christians are better than heathens. Prove to them that what you are pleased to call the "living God" teaches higher and nobler things, a grander and purer code of morals, than can be found upon pagan pages. Excel these wretches in industry, in honesty, in reverence for parents, in cleanliness, in frugality, and above all by advocating the absolute liberty of human thought.

Do not trample upon these people because they hav a different conception of things about which even this committee knows nothing.

Congress has nothing to do with the religion of the people. Its members are not responsible to God for the opinions of their constituents, and it may tend to the happiness of the constituents for me to state that they are in no way responsible for the religion of the members. Religion is an individual, not a national, matter. And where the nation interferes with the right of conscience, the liberties of the people are devoured by the monster superstition.

If you wish to drive out the Chinese do not make a pretext of religion. Do not pretend that you are trying to do God a favor. Injustice in his name is doubly detestable. The assassin cannot sanctify his danger by falling on his knees, and it does not help a falsehood if it be uttered as a prayer. Religion used to intensify the hatred of men toward men under the pretense of pleasing God has cursed the world.

A portion of this most remarkable report is intensely religious. There is in it almost the odor of sanctity, and when reading it one is impressed with the living piety of its authors. But on the twenty-fifth page there are a few passages that must pain the hearts of true believers. Leaving their religious views, the members immediately betake themselves to philosophy and prediction. Listen:

"The Chinese race and the American citizen, whether native born or who is eligible to our naturalization laws and becomes a citizen, are in a state of antagonism. They cannot nor will not ever meet upon common ground and occupy together the same social level. This is impossible. The pagan and the Christian travel different paths. This one believes in a living God; that one in the type of monsters and worship of wood and stone. Thus in the religion of the two races of men they are as wide apart as the poles of the two hemispheres. They cannot now nor never (sic) will approach the same religious altar. The Christian will not recede to barbarism, nor will the Chinese advance to the enlightened belt [whatever it is] of civilization. . . . . He cannot be converted to those modern ideas of religious worship which hav been accepted by Europe and which crown the American system."

Christians used to believe that through their religion all the nations of the earth were finally to be blessed. In accordance with that belief missionaries hav been sent to every land, and untold wealth has been expended for what has been called the spread of the gospel.

I am almost sure that I hav read somewhere that "Christ died for all men," and that "God is no respecter of persons." It was once taught that it was the duty of Christians to tell to all people the "tidings of great joy." I hav never believed these things myself, but hav always contended that an honest merchant was the best missionary. Commerce makes friends, religion makes enemies; the one enriches and the other impoverishes; the one thrives best where the truth is told, the other where falsehoods are believed. For myself, I hav but little confidence in any business, or enterprise, or investment that promises dividends only after the death of the stockholders.

But I am astonished that four Christian statesmen, four members of Congress, in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, who seriously object to people on account of their religious convictions, should still assert that the very religion in which they believe—and the only religion established by the living God, head of the American law—is not adapted to the spiritual needs of one-third of the human race. It is amazing that these four gentlemen hav, in the defense of the Christian religion, announced the discovery that it is wholly inadequate for the civilization of mankind; that the light of the cross can never penetrate the darkness of China; "that all the labors of the missionary, the example of the good, the exalted character of our civilization, makes no impression upon the pagan life of the Chinese;" and that even the report of this committee will not tend to elevate, refine, and Christianize the yellow heathen of the Pacific coast. In the name of religion these gentlemen hav denied its power and mocked at the enthusiasm of its founder. Worse than this, they hav predicted for the Chinese a future of ignorance and idolatry in this world, and, if the "American system" of religion is true, hell-fire in the next.

For the benefit of these four philosophers and prophets, I will giv a few extracts from the writings of Confucius, that will, in my judgment, compare favorably with the best passages of their report:

"My doctrine is that man must be true to the principles of his nature, and the benevolent exercise of them toward others.

"With coarse rice to eat, with water to drink, and with my bended arm for my pillow, I still hav joy.

"Riches and honor acquired by injustice are to me but floating clouds.

"The man who, in view of gain, thinks of righteousness, who, in view of danger, forgets life, and who remembers an old agreement, however far back it extends, such a man may be reckoned a complete man.

"Recompense injury with justice, and kindness with kindness.

"There is one word which may serve as a rule of practice for all one's life: Reciprocity is that word."

When the ancestors of the four Christian congressmen were barbarians, when they lived in caves, gnawed bones, and worshiped dried snakes, the infamous Chinese were reading these sublime sentences of Confucius. When the forefathers of these Christian statesmen were hunting toads to get the jewels out of their heads, to be used as charms, the wretched Chinese were calculating eclipses, and measuring the circumference of the earth. When the progenitors of these representatives of the "American system of religion" were burning women charged with nursing devils, the people "incapable of being influenced by the exalted character of our civilization," were building asylums for the insane.

Neither should it be forgotten that for thousands of years the Chinese hav honestly practiced the great principle known as civil-service reform, a something that even the admistration of Mr. Hayes has reached only through the proxy of promise.

If we wish to prevent the immigration of the Chinese, let us reform our treaties with the vast empire from whence they came. For thousands of years the Chinese secluded themselves from the rest of the world. They did not deem the Christian nation fit to associate with. We forced ourselves upon them. We called, not with cards, but with cannon. The English battered down the door in the names of opium and Christ. The infamy was regarded as another triumph for the gospel. At last, in self-defense, the Chinese allowed Christians to touch their shores. Their wise men, their philosophers, protested, and prophesied that time would show that the Christians could not be trusted. This report proves that the wise men were not only philosophers but prophets.

Treat China as you would England. Keep a treaty while it is in force. Change it if you will, according to the laws of nations, but on no account excuse a breach of national faith by pretending that we are dishonest for God's sake.

Robert G. Ingersoll.

Peter Cooper's Monument.

When old Peter Cooper became wealthy from selling glue, he also became imbued with a desire to do something that would render his name a household word. For hours at a time the old gentleman sat on his air-cushion and gazed over his spectacles at space, all the time revolving in his mind various plans by which he could accomplish his desired object. Among the other projects which are said to hav been discussed by him, with his son Eddie and his son-in-law, Abe Hewitt, was the purchasing of a quantity of damaged red flannel at auction, wherewith to make nether garments for the heathen; but Abe, who was once a tutor, pointed out to the old gentleman that the heathen mostly lived in tropical climates, and that they would be likely to use the red flannel as bait for bull-frogs, or some other purpose equally foreign to the good man's intentions.

Mr. Cooper reluctantly admitted the force of this argument, and relapsed into a moody silence. Edward, like a dutiful and affectionate son, was greatly moved at his father's distress, and, anxious to console him, suggested that he donate a stained-glass window to some one of the many churches; but while the old man rather fancied the idea, Abe again interfered, and suggested that such a memorial would only be seen by a comparative few, besides which the press would most likely say that the window was intended to commemorate the wisdom of buying glue on a falling market and selling on a rising market.

Edward was quite chagrined at this, while the old gentleman, on the principle of "misery loves company," was correspondingly elated. For some time there was an ominous silence, which was finally broken by Hewitt's suggesting that a large building be erected on a conspicuous site, to be used partly as a public library and partly as a large hall which could always be accessible to the masses for the purposes of meetings, lectures, etc. This, he said, would not only render Peter famous with the present generations but also perpetuate his memory for centuries to come. Perhaps Abe, in making this suggestion, saw an opportunity of lugging his own name before the public as a trustee of the institution, and—but let this go; suffice it to say that the plan met Peter's views, and the world knows the result.

Since Cooper Union has been thrown open to the public its spacious hall has been used alike by politician and demagogue, lecturer and divine. Within it hav been held meetings of every imaginable character. Anna Dickinson has there poured forth invective, and lashed public men with the whip of sarcasm; Wendell Phillips, unfettered, has criticised everybody and everything with silver-tongued oratory; Denis Kearney has uttered his blasphemy and billingsgate unannoyed, and even Victoria Woodhull has, on several occasions, ventilated her peculiar ideas of sociology from its wide platform.

But the liberality and freedom which has hitherto characterized the government of the Union appears to be gradually lessening. On the 29th of this month D. M. Bennett, the editor of The Truth Seeker, will be freed from prison, whither he was sent by Anthony Comstock, who ever and anon edifies a select circle of ministers with views of pictures that cannot but fail to shock and disgust any but the most depraved. The offense charged against Mr. Bennett was the selling a pamphlet treating of the marriage relations. A number of Mr. Bennett's friends, desiring to express their sympathy with him in his suffering, and gladness at his release from imprisonment, hav, within the past few weeks, been making arrangements to giv him a reception on his arrival in the city.

The first meeting of his friends having this object in view was so largely attended that it was decided to engage Cooper Institute, and hav the reception on a grand scale. The reception committee applied to the trustees of the Union, and to their surprise met with a peremptory refusal. Subsequently a protest against this action was forwarded to the trustees, which elicited the reply that "after a careful consideration they declined to reconsider their previous decision."

Abe Hewitt, when asked by a reporter of Truth the reason for this action of the trustees, drew himself naughtily up and sternly replied, "The trustees never giv their reasons, sir."

[Truth of the same date also contained the following notice of a new book published by the Petersons, of Philadelphia, one of the leading publishing houses of the country:]

The Messrs. Peterson, of Philadelphia, hav kindly forwarded us a newly-printed novel called "Nana," written by Emile Zola, and translated by John Sterling, with a request that we giv it a good notice. This we hasten to do.

"Nana" is, without a shade of doubt, the dirtiest, most beastly and obscene book that ever saw the light from any respectable publishing house. In the actual sublimation of filth it far surpasses the open and confessed nastiness of the professional obscenities known as "Those Books." There is not a page of "Nana" that does not bristle with suggestion even where it is not an open and lurid description of the actions of the worst class of Parisian women. Nana is a cocotte who sells her charms to this man and that. Not only is M. Zola very particular in his specifications of how much she gets, but he is equally realistic in the description of how much she gives. To analyze "Nana," however, would be to become as filthy as itself. No analysis could be complete without some quotations which would subject Truth to the accusation of sending obscene matter through the mails.

"Nana," probably because it is so dirty, is selling in thousands, and the Messrs. Peterson, who put out such literature to corrupt youth and foster the vices of sensual old age, are reaping a fortune from the work. It sells, and that is all this firm considers. They care not what young men are given the appetite for unholy joys, nor what young women, after reading, take the step that leads to the bagnio. The Messrs. Peterson enjoy the money that has been expended to learn such lessons of dishonor, ruin, and shame.

There is no excuse for the composition nor the publication of such books as "Nana." They teach nothing that should be known. The excuse of the modern school of realism in works of fiction is that there is nothing done or said in this world of ours that is not fit to describe. The theory is false. In the privacy of life there are many things which it is altogether unnecessary and unwise to make subjects of open conversation. It is abasing to dwell upon them. As well when you purchase a bouquet of fresh, sweet-smelling flowers to demand of the dealer an analysis of the manure in which they were grown. We may all know that manure is a necessity to the well-being of plants. But we don't wish the fact brought to our attention when at table enjoying a lettuce salad.

The point, however, that we would particularly suggest regarding "Nana" is the injustice of laws concerning obscene literature that will send the publisher of "Cupid's Yokes" to state prison and permit the open sale of a work which has not even a philosophical reason for its existence. We should not oppose Mr. Anthony Comstock's course so earnestly if, in place of becoming a petty persecutor of small people, he took the bull by the horns and brought large publishers like these Petersons up with a round turn for flooding the market with such demoralizing stuff as these books of Emile Zola. We hold ourselves responsible for the statement that no man who has been imprisoned by Comstock for publishing vile literature has ever put upon the world a book half so filthy and loathsome as this "Nana." Under the ruling of Judge Benedict that any publication having a tendency to debase the mind must come under the act, it would not be possible for the Petersons to escape conviction.

We hav nothing against the Petersons. We do not wish to see them go to jail. But if our laws are at all consistent we insist that they ought to go there. Bennett merely sold "Cupid's Yokes." The man who runs the bookstores on the Metropolitan Elevated Railroad sells "Nana." Under such decisions as were given in Bennett's case, this man who deals out "Nana" in seventy-five cent doses should now be in the Albany Penitentiary.

That is, if Anthony Comstock, District Attorney Woodford, and Judge Benedict were at all logical.

No boy, no girl, no woman, can rise from the perusal of "Nana" as pure in mind as when he or she sat down to it. It is a feast of filth, a flow of ordure, and the impurity permeates every page from the first to the last.

Most of the inhabitants of New York city know of the existence of Greene street. But it would advantage them nothing to read a detailed account of the life of its inmates, concealing nothing.

Yet that is "Nana" as concerns the Greene street of Paris—no more and no less.

Spiked His Gun.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It is not often you hear from this corner of the Lord's vineyard, hence it gives me so much more pleasure to record the fact that we here in Dallas hav at last been able to form an auxiliary local League, to be known as the Dallas Liberal League, No. 170. We organized permanently on the Lord's day, February 29, 1880. We number twenty-six members, among whom are five of the "weaker vessels," and hope soon to be a power in the land for good.

To show you what we are doing, I inclose clippings from the Herald, the leading daily here, to which paper we are principally indebted for the prominence we hav attained so far. We learn that the proprietors hav been remonstrated with by some of the orthodox for publishing our proceedings, but they were told that the Herald was a newspaper, and would publish facts, no matter what they were. The report of our meeting, with the Demands of Liberalism at the bottom of it, called out a "soldier of the cross" in an article, which I also inclose, and which in turn elicited a reply, as follows:

[Advertisement.]

READ.

"If the cause of Christ profit through my lies, why should I be adjudged a sinner?"—(St. Paul.)

The above text implies that the founders of Christianity considered falsehoods legitimate provided they were used for the purpose of advancing "the cause," that it might profit. To show that this same Jesuitical principle—the end justifies the means—is still adhered to by the "Christian preachers" of to-day is the purpose of this article.

Witness the following extract from an editorial purporting to be a criticism on the objects of the Liberal League, and which appeared in the Christian Preacher, a weekly sheet published in Dallas, of date, Lord's Day, March 14, 1880, to wit: "But in their onslaught on Christianity, the Lord's Day, and the Bible, they will find a motley crew for company. The gamblers, drunkards, dram-sellers, rakes, and rascals generally will be at their back, wishing them well and urging them on. The woman that stoops to such an association puts herself in a line with the lewd of her sex." Now these are lies manufactured out of whole cloth; but being uttered for the purpose of deterring the timid from joining our association, why should the Christian preacher be adjudged a sinner if "the cause of Christ" profit by his lies? The aforesaid Christian preacher is welcome to all the consolation he can derive from the precedent established by his prototype, St. Paul.

T. C. Cornet.

In addition to this "advertisement" (for which, by the way, a charge of $5.25 was made), the Times, in its evening issue of same date, March 23d, comes out, by way of incentive for the Christian Preacher to take it up, in the following language:

There seems to be war imminent between the Liberal League and some minister of the gospel in this city. Mr. Cornet champions the cause of the League in a card published in the Herald this morning. He starts the ball with a strong throw by saying that the assertions of the minister are "lies out of the whole cloth," a rather serious charge to be brought against a clergyman. As we hav not had a church quarrel for several weeks, the prospect ahead for first-class local items is good.

But I am sorry the Times man was disappointed, for nary a word the "Christian preacher" has had to say to this day either in his own paper or in any other. This, Mr. Editor, is the only way to spike their guns. Whenever they presume to cast odium on the character of Liberals, either as individuals or collectively, pin the lie right on to their foreheads. Any one who uses such language, be he preacher or layman, is a coward and dares not take it up.

Havn't we got the drop on them every time they venture to indulge in their favorite sport—vituperation and calumny? Can they support their vile slander by testimony? No. Who ever heard of a Liberal expiating a crime on the gallows or serving out a term in the penitentiary, unless it be, as in the case of our beloved friend Bennett, by conviction in the modern Star Chamber, the court of Benedict the bigot, on the trumped-up charge of obscenity, supported only by the testimony of Comstock the perjurer?

Brother Peterson, of Common Sense fame, writes, "I am sorry to see that friend Cornet has made a misquotation, as on that account his article loses its force." However, I can't see it in that light. See Romans iii, 7, and where is the difference? I did not hav the time, nor the inclination, to hunt through the old musty record for the verbatim; anyhow I giv the meaning of it, and it had the desired effect; i. e., to spike his gun. T. C. Cornet,

The "Key-Stone" Science.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I was going to write upon the utility of Spiritualism, until I read Mr. Chapman's argument in favor of its truths. I hope you will allow me to join issue with him. I will do it in courtesy—in a spirit of fair play. I know I shall say things that will offend. I will strive to say the offensive things in as pleasant a way as possible, with plainness.

Mr. Chapman throws down the gauntlet of war in a truly gallant manner. I cannot help admiring his courage, whether his reasoning is good or bad.

"Some people hav philosophies,
Strangely framed from end to end;
Better name would be sophistries,
For such theories wildly penned."

A strange science is mesmerism—one of the greatest delusions of the age—the science of insanity. This is the science, this is "the key-stone to Spiritualism;" so says Mr. Chapman in The Truth Seeker of March 27th. This is "the great proof which ere long is destined to convince the world that man is a spirit, and that the spirit of man is immortal."

There once was a time when I believed in mesmerism. I practiced and investigated, and ended in the firm conviction that mesmerism was a great delusion—clairvoyance nonsense. Take a mesmeric and set him before you; tell him mesmerism is a farce—that it is all nonsense. Having persuaded him against mesmerism, your power over him is gone. Take another mesmeric. Persuade him that you can let him see into the man, and he will tell you all about it. Try ten thousand of your patients, and they will, if kept apart, giv you ten thousand different reports. Place your hands in attitude of attracting your mesmeric; let a stranger hold him back; he will come up to you as if attracted by you. Do you feel the reaction upon your fingers? I know you do not. I therefore deny the attraction. Take a lancet and cut a nerve of sensation; then by the strongest act of your will strive to pass the nerve's vital fluid, or the sense of feeling, below the incision. You cannot do it. If you cannot, by the strongest act of your volition, pass the feeling a hair's breadth in your own body, how can you disembody it and send it into another body? It has not been proved that a nerve's vital fluid exists, but I am willing, for the sake of the argument, to take it for granted. When this fluid, or aura, passes from the mesmerist to the mesmeric, they are both wide awake, and we then hav the wonderful phenomenon of a wide-awake fluid going from a waken man to a waken man to produce sleep. If a sleepy fluid went from a sleepy man to the man wide awake to put him to sleep, would it not be more rational, and one might think more scientific, in the science which is "the key-stone to Spiritualism?"

Take another test, and I politely ask the attention of all parties to it, whether they be mesmerists, clairvoyants, Spiritualists, or parties who do not believe a word about this key-stone science:

Stand before an audience and tell that audience that you hav discovered a new nerve vital electric machine. By its means you can discharge a large quantity of mesmeric magnetism; that you wish one man from the audience to go with you into the anteroom to help you to work the machine. Praise it; puff it; get the audience to believe it. Go into the anteroom with your friend, sit by the fire, read the newspaper, laugh in your sleeve at those going to sleep. Come out and you will hav a lot of mesmerics. This is the key-stone to Spiritualism. This experiment I hav tested time after time. It proves mesmerism a delusion. Reduced to practice it proves that the belief in a thing, whether true or false, has the same effect, so far as acts of volition are concerned.

If any one wants to become a mesmerist let him learn the value of bounce, persuade people that he has got the power, and the trick is done. But my advice to the mesmeric is if you do not wish to be mesmerized do not believe in the bounce doctrine. Disbelieve all the charlatans say, and you and mesmerism will remain strangers.

Your correspondent falls into many errors upon his pet "key-stone" science. But his greatest error is when he says that no man can mesmerize himself. That is an assertion, and all truths appertain to an affirmation or a negation. I assert the opposite—that mesmerics put themselves to sleep by their foolish faith in this delusive so-called science. I fearlessly assert that there is not living upon this earth one man that can mesmerize another. The less of that nonsense, mesmerism, the better for humanity. If Spiritualism has to stand or fall by mesmerism, then it will hav to pull up some of its errors, throw to the wind some of its fancies, and learn that all truths are nothing more or less than a knowledge of facts. There are many things of which we know nothing, many things of which we know a little. But it is neither reason nor anything like logic to explain the little we know by that of which we know nothing. In the mystery of thinking there is ever the question, What thinks? The Spiritualists say soul, and explain by reference to mesmerism. But this explanation needs explaining. How can a soul think? It is just as likely that the brain thinks as the soul. The brain we know it is, and know something of it. The soul we do not know it is, and what is more, we know nothing of it. The germ theory proves nothing concerning the soul, and it is a mere begging of the question.

The absurd idea of comparing a soul to a man playing upon an organ is nothing better than a loss of time, because when the organ is dead there is the soul in existence, and cannot think a thought for want of the organ (brain). A soul without a thought is an existence without an existence, which is equivalent to say that it exists, but does not know that it exists. It has no consciousness. The question is often asked by modern Spiritualists and ancient ones, How can matter become conscious? How can consciousness become attached to matter? People often forget themselves and use a two-edged argument. How can spirit become conscious? How can consciousness become attached to soul? This is plain matter. Spirit is a fancy. Matter is a reality. Spirit is only a faith. That faith exercises its power upon the believer, so far as his acts of volition are concerned, and produces to the believer treatises upon the "key-stone" science—which is both a delusion and a snare—mesmerism.

It is useless to talk of either mesmerism or Spiritualism. I can do the mesmeric trick with any one. As for spiritual mediums, under the same conditions, I will do all that they can do, and that, too, without the aid of spirits.

Charles Audley.

Dr. A. J. Clark.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I would say to the many readers of The Truth Seeker in the West and the Northwest that I hav labored long and hard to get some learned Liberal worker who would be willing to take some risk with myself and other Liberals in the Western and Northwestern states. Hitherto but few communities hav been able to pay twenty or thirty dollars for one or two lectures. After a correspondence of over a year with Dr. A. J. Clark, of Indiana, I hav succeeded in getting this earnest, able, and radical worker to take the field at terms within the reach of all, provided he can be kept in constant employment. I am now ready to negotiate with societies or individuals for lectures, camp or grove meetings, or for a single lecture. I earnestly desire every reader of this paper to send me a postal with his name, post-office, county, and state plainly written; and in return I will send him my circular letter, which will fully explain my manner of operation, embracing list of subjects and scale of prices. Let me hear from you right away, for we ought to keep Bro. Clark in the field and busily at work for at least one year. For the last three weeks I hav been listening to him, and I am fully convinced that he is the right man in the right place to do this missionary work. Sober and temperate in his habits, clear and logical in his reasoning, and possessing a magnetism and earnestness that at once attract attention and reach the understanding, the common people hear him gladly. Address F. F. Follett.

Discussion of the National Financial System.

BETWEEN DR. H. H. MORRISON AND JOHN W. TRUESDELL.

DR. MORRISON'S FIFTH LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: John Stuart Mill said that "one man with an idea is a more potent factor of social advancement than a thousand men with only interests." History, as well as our life-experience, demonstrates the fact that only a few hav been imbued with the love of humanity to that degree that they were able to abandon their individual interests and devote themselves to the upbuilding of the great interests of society. The careful student of history will notice at every step of the world's progress the contrast between ideas and interests. One of the most notable examples of the fierce struggles between ideas and interests was exemplified in the war—first of ideas, then of swords—between slavery and freedom in our own country. The man of ideas points out wrongs in society and government and proposes a reformation; but interest cries out, Hands off, you man of one idea; you must not interfere with the established order of things.

Mr. Truesdell's last article but too plainly proves that, Liberal as he is in religion, interests are blinding him in regard to the great question of financial reform. Reform never entices the opulent or ruling classes. It has little or no fascination for the rich and contented. The dissatisfied, the wronged, are those who lead in reforms, or else those who, like Garrison, lead a life of devotion to the cause of suffering and outraged humanity. Ideas always begin the battle, whilst interests, as in the slaveholder's case, are nearly always the first to change it from a moral to a physical conflict.

It is to be hoped, Mr. Editor, that this conflict between ideas and interests, between liberty and political and material slavery, will be settled peacefully and intelligently at the polls, and by patriotic legislation, rather than on the sanguinary field of blood.

Mr. Truesdell says he is both national banker and broker. I hope he is not one of the kind we in the West call "curbstone brokers." They are the fellows who do the dirty cutthroat business for the bankers—stealing under and over the law.

I am not surprised that Mr. Truesdell will not agree with my showing of the per cent gains of national banks; but he ought to be willing to tell the whole truth, as given by the Comptroller of the Currency, and too in a way that would not mislead even the ordinary reader. But we find him following his guide, the Comptroller, whose every argument is in the interest of the national system—really using the same figures and arguments.

During the year, from September 1, 1872, to September 1, 1873 (pages 54 and 55 of report for 1873), we find the net earnings given as follows: For the first six months, net earnings, $31,926,478—5.37 per cent; last six months, $38,122,000—5.46 per cent; total earnings for the year, $65,048,478; total per cent, 10.88.

Thus we find that even to calculate the interest on the reported capital and surplus, as Mr. Truesdell contends for, the interest is nearly 11 per cent per annum, large enough in all conscience.

Without stating my former argument in regard to the interest accumulated by the national banks, I will simply say that in spite of Mr. Truesdell's attempted ridicule, I yet adhere to the correctness of my statements. I hav long since learned that most men when they are on the wrong side of any question and they can't uphold their side by just reasoning, then resort to ridicule and evasion.

Friend Truesdell, it won't win; the thoughtful reader will see through the scum and rightly perceive the truth.

To show up the power of the national system to accumulate by interest, and in that way to build up a powerful money power, as it has, I will now giv Mr. Truesdell some more figures, which he may put to "soak," and see how he will dispose of them. The national banks, as a whole, drew interest for thirteen years, ending with 1878, on about three times their nominal capital and more than twice their capital and surplus. (See report of 1878, page 13 of appendix.) On the 1st of October, 1878, the capital of the national banks (2 053) was $466,147,436; the amount of their loans was $833,988,450. This is the amount they were drawing interest on in addition to interest on their bonds on file at Washington, amounting to,

|---|---|
| 1. Bonds for circulation | $347,556,650 |
| 2. Bonds for deposits | 47,936,850 |
| 3. United States bonds on hand | 46,785,600 |
| | $442,279,100 |
| Loans and discounts, as above | 833,988,450 |
| Total amount upon which they were drawing interest | $1,276,267,550 |

Now suppose we deduct, not the whole amount of their currency, but their average bank circulation, for the same period, which was $307,299,854, and we hav left, as their real capital, the amount of $275,167,143. Thus, the banks really, during the date above given, drew interest on more than four times their real capital.

Mr. Truesdell will again fly into a tempest over this last showing; but he need not, for it is the truth. Suppose, Mr. Truesdell, this bank circulation of over three hundred and seven million dollars is a liability, do they not hav the use of it for twenty years at the mere nominal sum of one per cent per annum? And did not the banks make during those same years about 9½ per cent clear profits, as per Comptroller's Report? Who would not assume liabilities upon such terms?

If the above figures are not conclusive, look at the statement of the First National Bank of Greencastle, Indiana, as found on page 585 of report of 1878.

And here Mr. Truesdell cannot accuse me of picking out a bank favorably located, viz., the Second National Bank of Jersey City, the statement of which is found on page 348, same report, which drew interest on four times its nominal capital and surplus.

|---|---|
| The loans and discounts of the Greencastle bank were | $163,700 |
| Bonds for circulation | 134,000 |
| Amount upon which they were drawing interest | $297,700 |
| Nominal capital | $125,000 |
| Surplus fund | 64,500 |
| Total capital and surplus | $189,500 |

Thus you will see that this bank—not an average one by any means—drew interest on more than one and a half times its nominal capital and surplus, and over four times the amount of its real capital.

My "glaring inconsistencies, as exemplified in my striking illustration of fiat bookkeeping," has doubtless disturbed my friend Truesdell a little, if indeed he has not been really vexed, to think that a man with but a limited education, living in a prairie town, far from the "droppings of the sanctuary" (Wall street), and who never—no, never—had a banking education, should dare to criticise the national banking institution in its relations to the prosperity—or otherwise—of our people, as individuals and as a nation, whether it be in reality a blessing or a curse, a benefaction or a fraud.

Mr. Truesdell indirectly accuses me of knowing nothing about the bank question. The priest has always arrogated to himself the exclusive prerogative of interpreting the "mysteries of godliness," but some hav questioned his authority and disputed his dogmas. And yet springtime and harvest come and go, the birds sing as sweetly, the flowers bloom as brightly, and loving tenderness is cherished by the hand of affection just as though an endless, tormenting "hell" had never been invented. And in spite of all the sneers and sarcasm, all the vindictive names or ridicule heaped upon us by the pampered foes of liberty, their hireling press, or paid attorneys, the people will think and will dare to criticise any institution, and destroy it too, that will seek to abridge the liberties or to destroy the prosperity of our country.

In a former article Mr. Truesdell told us that the banks had paid state and national taxes to the amount of about one hundred and seventy million dollars. But he did not tell us that the producers of this country had not only paid to the banks this same one hundred and seventy million dollars, but had paid, interest alone, some one billion five hundred million dollars besides.

S. P. Chase was the decoy "duck" to induce the government to enact this most infamous law creating national banks. The bill was reported by John Sherman in the Senate February 2, 1863, taken up on the 9th, and passed on the 12th by a vote of 22 to 21. On the 13th it was sent to the House, and, without being referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, was taken up on the 19th and passed on the 20th by a vote of 78 to 64. Led thus by Secretary Chase and John Sherman, it was lashed through Congress and became a law, with but little discussion, in the brief space of ten days.

This national bank law was the invention of the money kings—gotten up for their benefit. The Comptroller says the institution was intended to be permanent. (Page 6, report of 1878.) Also same report, page 18, says, "One of the chief objects in view in the organization of the national system was to supply a steady market for and facilitate the negotiation of United States bonds." Just so. Now I unhesitatingly say that the erection of an untaxed interest-bearing bonded debt, together with the national bank system, was the greatest wrong inflicted upon our people of anything in the history of our nation.

Mr. Truesdell characterizes bank currency as debt. Then, as has been charged, banks draw interest on what they owe, while other people pay interest on what they owe. And further, this debt of the banks, which we are compelled to use as a medium of exchange, is based upon another debt, an interest-bearing debt, but untaxed. Then the people furnish the legal basis for every national bank note, and pay from four to six per cent interest on it besides.

Mr. Truesdell says that "most of the national banks bought their bonds in the market, paying in many cases a high premium." This is perhaps correct, but it does not affect the other fact that the great leading bankers of the country—I mean those who afterward started national banks—did purchase their bonds at about 48 per cent, about $410,000,000, for which they paid the government, gold value, $197,750,000. About the same time, or shortly after, the Rothschilds took $400,000,000 of the same bonds and paid 41½ cents on the dollar, or $166,000,000. Thus in these two transactions the government submitted to a shave of $446,250,000.

The point I desire to make here is this: Mr. Truesdell said in his last letter that "these bonds were not created for the benefit of the banks." Now, it is true that the money kings of the East advocated and urged a bonded debt. They invented and demanded the national system, and because Congress at first refused to grant what they asked they utterly refused to loan any more money to the government—even stopped the loan of $150,000,000 before it was nearly all taken that they had agreed to take. Bonds are the basis of the national banks. They hav no existence, neither can they hav without the bonds. The creation of the bonds, the law creating the national system of banking, and the depreciation of the greenback by the Senate in the two exceptions imposed upon them—the greenback currency—are but the parts of a well-concocted plan to usurp the control of the currency of our country, and through the operation of the bond and national system to build up a powerful money oligarchy, through which all the surplus productions of our great country could be accumulated and concentrated into a mighty force that, in time, would build up a landed and money monopoly living off of the fat of the land, while the great mass of producers would be compelled to liv in poverty and in ignorance. Do you think the people, if they had understood it, and had been consulted as to the propriety of the bond debt, would ever hav consented to their creation? Never! never! Suppose the government had, instead of issuing bonds, issued full legal-tender money, paid it out for war material with which to crush the rebellion, for salaries, etc., and redeemed the surplus issue by taxation—the only way the government can raise her revenue—would the people not hav been vastly better off, happier, and more prosperous? And will you, Mr. Truesdell, dare to say that Congress could not hav done it? Congress has taxed the people heavily to pay the bondholder his interest in gold, when he gave the government less than fifty cents on the dollar for those same bonds, while to-day the face of the bonds are unpaid, and are hanging like a deadly upas-tree upon the life of our nation and our industries. Bonds are the basis of every fraud, of every oppression and deceit, which led to the crisis of 1873. They exempt the rich from taxation; they force unheard-of taxes on the producer and on the laborer; they enable the aristocratic and idle to liv in luxury, while they force the masses of the people into a perpetual slavery to interest and taxes. No people on the earth were ever so infamously imposed upon by the money power as the American people. If Congress had issued full legal-tender money to meet every necessity, and declared every man a traitor to his country, and confiscated his property, who refused to receive and treat it as such, and then redeemed it with the duties, excises, imports, and taxes used to pay interest on the bonds, we should not now owe a dollar, and would hav $750,000,000 in the treasury.

And you, Mr. Truesdell, think I "heard the wrong noise when I attacked the national banks." Permit me to say, sir, that you will perhaps liv to see the day when, through the ballot-boxes of free America, you and the rest of the national bankers will hear a sound that you will understand—a sound that will forever damn and sink into utter oblivion an institution that is so imperial in its demands and designs as to, through its chosen organ, the New York Tribune, utter such a damnable and traitorous threat as "that its machinery is now in operation, so that, in any emergency, the financial corporations of the East can act together at a single day's notice, and with such power that no act of Congress can overcome or resist their decision."

Free Americans, hav you heard the sound of the above quotation? Do you understand its meaning? if not, take the history of Europe—Ireland, in particular—and from that learn lessons of wisdom, and take warning. Your interested, untaxed bond-banker may scoff at "fiat bookkeeping," call us Greenback lunatics, etc., just as the slaveholder and his allies called the man who opposed human slavery by the then maligned and stigmatized name of "Abolitionist." But the time will come when the other fellows—not the fiatists—will conclude that 'tis their heads that need "soaking."

Mr. Truesdell may indirectly call me a fool, but all that does not change facts nor my convictions in regard to bonds, national banks, interest, etc. I see that you did not answer or even allude to the questions I asked in my last letter. I will now ask you some more, and I hope you will answer. How does it come that whenever there is a proposition made to issue or re-issue legal-tender currency by the government that that is called by all the bank organs "inflation," while they (the banks) never open their mouths to say a word about inflation when they increase their circulation, as they hav done in the last year? And suppose we carry out the idea of redemption, is not the government, with all its resources—gold included—just a little bit safer than individual corporations, with their promises to pay, based upon gold, and especially when the banks retain the security—gold—in their own possession? Don't slip around this question, but answer it. It won't take long.

Again, bank currency never gets out among the people, except as it is exchanged for interest-bearing notes, well secured; in other words, every dollar of bank currency that is circulating among the people is drawing to the banks from seven to fourteen per cent compound interest. Now, suppose that Congress should retire the national system, and, instead of their bills, put out legal-tenders as pay to government officers and expenses of all kinds, until the amount equaled the present outstanding bank circulation, would that not go out among the people without interest, and would it not be just that much better for the people? It won't take long to answer this question also?

Now, Mr. Truesdell, good naturedly, let us try that farm question again. I stated my farm question as I did because I thought you would perhaps get the idea through your head easier than the other way, but I was mistaken. You are a banker, not a farmer. Uncle Sam was the rich uncle. In his distress he submitted to the dictation that interest-bearing, untaxed bonds should be created. He then proposed to issue his own paper and make it a full legal tender, but submitted to two exceptions, which depreciated the greenback and created a market for gold, and enabled those who owned it to bull up the price until those few capitalists of the East could and did purchase a large amount of those bonds for less than fifty cents on the dollar, gold value. Then the national bank system was established.

Now five men with $40,000 in gold exchange for $100,000 in government bonds. They then organize a bank, deposit the bonds with the Secretary, upon which the Secretary issues and gives to the bank $90,000 in government currency to bank upon for twenty years, for which the bank pays one per cent per annum upon the average amount kept loaned out.

Now, Mr. Truesdell, for the next twenty years what is your capital in the bonds—bonds instead of the farm? Now soak your head awhile, and see if you can answer that simple problem truly. Now, Mr. Truesdell, as you, or some one else, hav been kind enough to send marked copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing your articles to each of the national banks in my town, I shall request the editor to send each a copy containing this article, so that the gentlemen connected with the banks can see just what kind of "glaring inconsistencies" I hav made. I do not think it fair for my neighbor bankers, whom I recognize as honorable gentlemen, to hav but one side of the question presented to them, and I shall not be considered as slighting them.

I now think that, so far as I am concerned, I shall close this discussion with my next letter, in which I will try to satisfy Mr. Truesdell in regard to the "unit of value" he is so distressed about. H. H. MORRISON.

Charleston, Ill., March 29, 1880.

P. S.—I should hav called attention to another item of accumulations by the national system. In addition to the surplus fund of nearly $117,000,000 there should hav been added nearly $41,000,000 of undivided profit. H. H. M.

Mr. Chapman Reviewed.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of March 27th appears a long article from the pen of E. A. Chapman on the subject, "Does Death End All?" I feel that although the writer is sincere in what he writes, he has made such terribly wrong statements about many things that I am confident that, had he understood even the first principles of physiology, he would never hav made them.

Therefore, without going into a discussion on the subject matter, as it is one that will never be settled in this life to the satisfaction of all parties, I feel that should I allow the whole article to pass without comment, I would not be doing justice to the many readers of your paper, and thereby lending myself to what I consider false teaching on a matter of physiology.

First, he quotes, "Evolution knows no finality;" and asks, "If this is true, where, beyond man, is the next step?" In answer, I can say that if evolution is true in any sense, it must be true in all senses; and in connection with all life, not only in man, but of all the animals, and must continue in the future, as it has in the past, evolving higher grades of intelligence and becoming possessed with more and more knowledge with each succeeding age until this earth shall hav performed its mission and ceased to be habitable, giving place to other planets, and perhaps other types of organisms, to go through the same process again through all succeeding ages; and the capacity for the growth of intelligence in animals I consider is just as unlimited as in man, but they will never advance to such extent as to "make man unnecessary," for the very reason that man will never stop long enough to allow the animal to catch up.

Evolution don't do things that way. Everything moves together, and man and the animal kingdom will always hold the same relative positions that they now do.

Again he says: "We are told by Materialistic oracles that combustion creates magnetism and intelligence. How do they know? Hav they ever proved it, or is it mere assumption? If this is true, why is not a hog or a dog as intelligent as man, because combustion is greater in either of these animals than in man?"

Now, if I was disposed to be facetious in this matter, and answer the question in the same sweeping manner in which it is asked, I should say that they were as intelligent as some men, but I prefer to explain why such is not the case.

We find by comparative anatomy that the brains of men and animals differ in many important particulars, and even in different individuals. We find great differences corresponding exactly to the different grades of intelligence possessed by them. The brain is made up of two different substances, the "gray, or evolving matter," and the "white, or conducting matter." And if "some of the greatest minds that the world has ever produced hav dwelt in feeble, attenuated bodies," it is due only to the fact that their brains contained a great preponderance of the gray matter, and to that fact alone. And I do not think that any Materialist who understands the first principles of physiology will ever assert that combustion in the brain ever "creates magnetism or intelligence;" but I do assert that combustion in the gray matter of the brain evolves, produces, or manufactures—just which word you please; any word but create—thoughts and ideas, and it is by the combination of these ideas that we convey the impression to others that we are intelligent beings; and if we use the word "create," we use it only in the same sense that we would say that the combustion of fuel in a stove creates heat, meaning in reality that by combining the oxygen of the atmosphere with the carbon and hydrogen of the fuel they undergo a chemical combination that changes them into water and carbonic acid, with a residue of inorganic matter, and while undergoing this combination we hav the evolution of heat. Nothing is created that did not exist before in a latent state; it was only waiting for the proper conditions in order to be developed. And when the writer says that we might as "well talk about combustion building a railroad," I will state that that is just exactly the way railroads are built. From the first evolution of the idea in the mind of the engineer who plans it, through all the succeeding stages of its construction, it is all done either by combustion of the brain or of the muscular system.

Again, he says, "the Materialist says 'the mind is a function of the brain,' and I would as soon call the musician the function of the piano as to declare that the mind is the function of the brain." Well, so would any one of any sense, but the trouble is our friend is mistaking the effect for the process. If he would state the case as it is, and say that scientific Materialists believe that one of the functions of the brain is the production of thoughts and ideas through the processes of chemical combinations and their consequent combustion, thereby evolving the mind, he would be coming much nearer the truth and, by so doing, leave no ground on which to draw comparison.

The only explanation I can offer of what the mind is, is the power of the brain to receive impressions from the external world and, through a metamorphosis, convert them into ideas. These ideas are evolved from the great nerve center of the cerebrum, whose special province is to preside over every other nerve center in the system—seeing that they co-ordinate in all their movements; and these ideas are made manifest to others through the medium of speech; and just in proportion as the speech is connected and free from absurdities do we say that the person is of sound mind, meaning that the front part of the brain, or cerebrum, is free from disease; and just in proportion as the speech is disjointed and incoherent do we say that the person is of unsound mind or a lunatic, meaning thereby that the great nerve center is diseased and incapable of performing its proper function. And the assertion that the "brain is an instrument of the mind," can best be refuted by asking Bro. Chapman if he has ever watched the growth of mind in a little child from the first few weeks of its life, when it first begins to smile and notice its mother and others, thus showing the first awakening of a mind in a brain already several months old? And after watching the growth of that mind, year after year, just in proportion as the brain is well nourished and developed, can he then make the sweeping assertion that mind was made before matter?

Again, he says: "Materialists hav never been able to explain how the inner consciousness receives impressions through the five senses. Vision can be traced to the optic nerve, hearing, to the audic nerve, etc., but no further; beyond that all is assumption."

Perhaps it may be all assumption with the Materialist, but is not so to the physiologist. Every nerve of special sense, after receiving its peculiar impression of taste, smell, hearing, etc., conveys it inward to its special ganglion, where it is received and again transmitted onward by direct nerve filaments to the great nerve center, the cerebrum, to be there converted into an idea, or, if you please, the knowledge that the special nerve conveying the impression has performed its proper function.

And it is just this great nerve center which presides over every other nerve of the body and performs so many different functions that our friend Chapman chooses to call the sixth sense, or spirituality. It is like the great central office of an intricate telegraph system; the sub offices are only in communication with each other by sending and returning all messages through it.

Bro. Chapman states that some brains are of coarser texture than others. That is a new idea, but, unfortunately, not true. A specimen of brain from the head of an Australian savage—the lowest form of humanity—placed under a microscope alongside of a specimen from the head of Daniel Webster or Wendell Phillips, we could discover no difference; all nerve cells would be alike; in fact, all the same "texture."

But it is the difference in the amount of gray matter in the different brains that does "account for the attributes and power of the spirit." And not until spoken language—that great concealer of our thoughts—becomes obsolete will people ever be able to read each other's thoughts without its aid.

I hav many more things in Bro. Chapman's article, not to criticise, but to correct, but I am afraid I hav already taken more space than will be willingly accorded me.

H. J. PURDY.

The Probabilities Are that Death Does End All.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just read the very interesting article of E. A. Chapman on the subject of immortal life, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 27th. And while I agree to the truth of very many of his statements and admire the general tone of the whole article, I must still dissent from some of his propositions and assertions.

I cannot see that he has given, in the whole argument, one single proof that when a man dies he shall, or does, liv again. It may be true that man alone, of all that exists, is "capable of unlimited growth and expansion," and that in him "evolution has found its finality;" but to me it looks reasonable that in "evolving higher and higher grades of intelligence," there will be no need of passing on from "sphere to sphere," but that as man is of earth, on earth will he reach all he can ever attain to. If man has in the past grown up and evolved from lower forms of development, who shall say how much he may still improve in body and in mind through the countless ages to come? Was it possible for the troglodytes and cave-dwellers of antiquity to imagine the existence here, or anywhere, of such a vastly superior race as now inhabits the enlightened countries of the globe? Why, their very gods were mere savages when compared to the most ordinary individuals among us. And how then are we able to comprehend the vastly superior races that may yet be evolved and developed in the billions of years during which our earth may be inhabitable?

Mr. Chapman says, "The soul is permanent, steadfast, and accumulative, while the body is fleeting and changeable." But can he prove this? We know that the particles of the body are being continually exchanged for new ones, but each atom that enters into the system becomes at once a fac simile of the one that was expelled. Every scar, every deformity, every sore spot, every shade of eye, hair, and skin, are so faithfully retained as to be seemingly permanent, yet there is all the while a slow and gradual change. Scars fade and are often entirely obliterated; the hair grows darker or turns gray, and the whole system shows marks of growth, age, and decay; and may this not apply equally to the mind? As the new particles enter the body, the vivid impressions of memory, of love, of hate, of all the feelings and passions, as well as the intellectual powers, are impressed upon each one of them as far as it becomes us.

Mr. Chapman tells us that "nature is not cruel or treacherous. She does not fill us with an honest aspiration and then mock us with annihilation." But she really does do this very thing. She is just as stern, unyielding, "and treacherous" as she is kind, gentle, loving, and benevolent. She is just as true to her irrevocable laws when she sends storms, floods, pestilence, famine, and grasshoppers as when she gives us the warm summer breezes, the gently-descending showers, the full fruitage of vine, bush, and tree; the plenteous harvest, and all the abundance of her bounteous gifts for our health and happiness.

Her earthquakes swallow up the innocent little child, the fair and beautiful maiden, and the strong, noble, and intelligent man just as relentlessly as they ingulf the savage denizens of the forest or the worms and insects that are in its path. No man who has ever lived, and has had "honest aspirations," has ever felt them all to be realized. We are continually "mocked" with unfulfilled desires, and it is well for us that it is so, as perfect contentment would be perfect inertia of mind and body—an impossible of all impossibles.

We are also told that "the spirit of man has always existed, and therefore always will." As well say that the noise made by the ringing of a bell, the voice of a man, or the rushing of the wind always existed. These things are no less mere productions of the causes named than is the spirit, soul, or mind of man a production or result of his organization, education, and environments. The child has neither mind, sensation, nor breath before birth; all these things are after-existences. The mind first begins to form with the first sensations of feeling, and every after experience adds to its quantity or quality.

If there be any real truth in clairvoyance, clairaudience, etc., I think it will be found to be the natural manifestation of some as yet not fully understood or completely developed law of living, material, earthly humanity. If it be true that Mrs. E. M. F. Denton can, by taking a bit of the tooth of a mastodon in her hand, and being entirely ignorant of what it is, tell all about the animal, describe the locality where it lived, and even taste the food it ate, through what she terms "the soul of things," may not this account for much of the phenomena attributed to clairvoyance, Spiritualism, etc.? If things take into themselves images of all that is around them or passes before them—and there are people who, like Mrs. Denton, can take a bit of rock from the mammoth cave and explore recesses where man has never yet been—is it not probable that in time much that is now a mystery may be explained and man rise to a far higher development here than we can now conceive of? Might not that lock that was left locked by the drowned man, and then was opened through the aid of a spiritual medium, hav retained enough of the soul-influence of the dead man to impress the word it was locked upon on the sensitive mind of that medium? All this is wonderful, it is true, but it is not so unreasonable or incomprehensible as would be the eternally continued personal identity of a thing that once had no existence.

"Eternal justice is a mockery and compensation is a myth." If one child is born blind, lame, or idiotic; another with all the highest known perfections of mind and body, the one condition is just as much the result of natural laws as is the other, and nature does her part to one precisely as well as she does to the other. Everything is as it is through circumstances. Because "it's an ill wind that blows nobody good" is no proof that all is intended to work out for the greatest good of all; and if some ills are compensated for through force of conscience, as, for instance, when a person who is deprived through some incapacity of physical strength from performing bodily labor devotes himself to the study of some branch of art or science, and becomes a great poet, painter, musician, or philosopher, thus finds "compensation" in this for what he had lost in bodily vigor or strength. But these compensations do not always come, nor when they fail to come is there a shadow of proof that "the books will be balanced in the world to come." Because a man is born full of the fires of lust and passion, or with a propensity to steal, lie, or murder, and circumstances foster these evil traits, is it reasonable to suppose this man will hav an undue amount of the virtues in a life to come as a "compensation" for what he lacks here?

Please do not think I wish to ridicule or blame our Spiritual friends for their ideas and opinions. I believe them just as truly Liberal as the Materialists are, and just as honest and sincere, as a class. I feel that to Spiritualists the great and rapidly increasing movement of free, progressive thought is due. But it is the duty of every one to think, read, and examine; to question, to sift, and to learn; to combat what he thinks is erroneous, and to speak plainly and fearlessly his own highest thoughts; and hence my presumption in venturing to point out what I think is untenable in the very able article of our worthy friend Chapman.

I must do nothing, or I must do all;
My thought must act or it will sting to death;
It must go forth and be a living breath,
Nerve the strong man and set the brain on fire,
And, in the mighty deed, full worth acquire.

Mr. Bennett's New Work.

Volume I. of this work is now in press, and will be ready to deliver to subscribers about May 1st. Volume II. is now being put into type as rapidly as our facilities will admit of, and will be ready for delivery in a few weeks. The work has been written under peculiar circumstances, and will be invested with peculiar interest to thousands of the author's friends, as well as to many others. The work will undoubtedly be a popular one to a large share of the Liberal public, and will be read with interest and profit by very many people. The following is the title-page:

The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times. By D. M. Bennett, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers, "The Champions of the Church," "Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures," "Interrogatories to Jehovah," "What I Don't Believe, What I Do Believe, Why and Wherefore," "From Behind the Bars." Joint author of "Christianity and Infidelity—the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," "The Bennett-Teed Discussion," etc., etc. Written in prison, while serving out a sentence of thirteen months in the Albany Penitentiary; nominally for sending through the U. S. mails a pamphlet by E. H. Heywood on the subject of marriage and the relations of the sexes, but really for being an Infidel editor and publisher. In two volumes.

This is the dedication:

To Mrs. Margaret McEwen and Mrs. Martha Van Allen (mother and daughter), two noble women (the former, wife of the superintendent of the prison), who hav shown marked kindness, not only to the writer, but to the many sick and dying in the prison hospital (where these pages were written), and who, by their continued kindness, hav caused many rays of cheerful sunshine to fall upon the sick and hapless prisoners (though differing in religious views from the author), this work is most respectfully and most gratefully dedicated.

The preface reads as follows:

The following work is, perhaps, more a compilation than an original production. Much of the data necessarily had to be gathered from various sources, and where it was found in better language than I could clothe it in, I hesitated not to quote freely rather than re dress it in language of my own. The authorities most used are Mrs. Lydia Maria Child's "Progress of Religious Ideas," Rev. James Freeman Clarke's "Ten Great Religions," Murray's "Manual of Mythology," Tooke's "Pantheon of Heathen Gods," Professor Anderson's "Norse Mythology," Clodd's "Childhood of Religion," Inman's "Ancient Faiths," Tuttle's "Career of Religious Ideas," Professor Draper's "Intellectual Development of Europe," Tylor's "Primitive Culture," besides others in lesser degree.

The work has been written under some disadvantages—in prison and in the hospital belonging thereto, surrounded by sick and dying men of varied nationalities, colors, and crimes; sometimes twenty of us in a single room, and a portion of the time when my own health was so much impaired as to unfit me for writing. I hav not had by me many works I would gladly hav consulted. In view of these facts the indulgent reader will make due allowance for such imperfections as may be observed.

My imprisonment is simply a piece of religious persecution, instituted by orthodox enemies in consequence of my heterodox opinions, and because I am editor and publisher of an outspoken and radical journal, as well as of books, pamphlets, etc., in the same line. I was charged with mailing "obscene literature." The charge is wholly unjust. The little argumentative and philosophical work upon which I was convicted contains not a word that is obscene, and is couched in as unobjectionable language as any philosophical work of the kind. The author is radical, but learned, honest, and sincere. I am a bookseller, and sold the work in question as openly and innocently as any other in my stock. My patrons had just the same right to purchase that book as any other I sold, and I had a perfect right to accommodate them. My conviction was a foregone conclusion, and my trial a very unfair one—a mere mockery of justice, the object being to crush me and my business. The instigator of the prosecution, the prosecuting attorney, his assistant, the judge, and the jury were orthodox, and religious opponents and enemies. I was prepared to show, by the first booksellers, writers, authors, philologists, and experts in the country, that the work is not obscene. This privilege was denied me. I was not allowed to show the purpose and object of the work. I was not allowed to hav it in its entirety read to the jury. I was not allowed to compare it with numerous standard works sold daily by all dealers. The rulings and decisions of the court were against me in every instance, and the charge to the jury was of the same character. The same rulings and instructions would convict every bookseller in the country. (For particulars see verbatim report of trial.) The verdict which sent me to prison was in keeping with the same persecuting spirit which has sent millions to the dungeon, to the rack, to the scaffold, and to the stake in the centuries that are past. It is much to be regretted that the government of the United States—founded by Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, and Adams, presided over by Lincoln, and boasted of as the freest government in the world—free for all kinds of religious opinions—should lend itself and its courts to send a man to prison on account of his religious views; and that its acting Executive, R. B. Hayes, should listen to the behests of my enemies, and disregard the prayer of 200,000 citizens that simple justice might be done me, and I restored to liberty!

It was the original design to keep this work within the compass of a single volume, but to do justice to the subjects treated this has been found impracticable. It is hoped the whole will be found interesting and instructive.

Albany Penitentiary, March 31, 1880. D. M. B.

Among the contents of Vol. I. are the following: Vedic Gods: Indra, Varuna, Agni, and all others; Brahmanic Gods: Vishnu, Siva, Christna, Buddha, and all others; Gods of Persia and Chaldea: Bel or Baal, Astarte, Ormuzd, Mithra, Ahriman, and numerous others; Gods of Egypt: Amun or Ammon, Osiris, Isis, Typhon, Sphinx; Gods of China: Chang-ti, Fo or Fohi, Hwa-Kwang, Kwan-Tan, etc.; Gods of Greece and Rome: Uranus, Kronos, Saturn, Jupiter, Neptune, Pluto, Vulcan, Mercury, Apollo, Bacchus, Venus, Minerva, Diana, and more than fifty others; Gods of the Norsemen: Odin, Thor, Balder, Tyr, Forsette, Brage, and Indun, Hoder, Loke, the Fenris Wolf, the Midgard Serpent, etc.

The Reception.

We would remind the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to be making arrangements for attending this gathering to do honor to the martyr to freedom of expression of opinion in this country. At a meeting of the Committee on Monday it was resolved to reserve seats for those from a distance. Any intending to come will be furnished with tickets on application to D. E. Ryan, 231 West 37th street, this city, or to this office. Rooms can be procured at the Putnam House, 4th avenue and 26th street, for 50 cents, upward; at the Anthony House, Broadway and 13th street, for 50 cents, upward; at the Continental, 20th street and Broadway, for $1 upward; at the Ashland House, 24th street and 4th avenue, for $1 and upward.

There will be plenty of good speaking, good music, and good cheer.

Since the first acknowledgment of subscriptions to the fund, there has been sent in the following:

|---|---|
| Dr. William McLawry | $ 4.00 |
| James Barney | 10.00 |
| W. H. Porter | 1.00 |
| William Rowe | 5.00 |
| Dr. C. H. Sheppard | 5.00 |
| M. Reiman | 10 00 |
| B. Doscher | 1.00 |
| Peter Soule | 1.00 |
| M. Babcock | 4 00 |
| A. Coulter | 2 00 |
| Sallie J. Miner | 2.00 |
| J. J. Mollineaux | 1.00 |
| J. L. Parshall | 5.00 |
| W. J. Haldeman | 5.00 |

The Committee returns thanks to these friends for their aid. If all of Mr. Bennett's friends will lend their presence the meeting will be the largest ever seen in this city.

THE Fourth New York Liberal League met at the residence of Daniel E. Ryan, 231 West 37th street, on the 7th inst., to make arrangements for the reception by the League of its President, D. M. Bennett, on his return from his enforced retirement in the Albany Penitentiary. Henry A. Stone, the Vice-President, occupied the chair. The members of the League were unanimous in the support of Mr. Bennett in his defense of Liberal principles, and heartily sympathized with him in his martyrdom; and while they expressed a determination to join heart and hand in the public reception to be tendered him at Chickering Hall, they yet felt it their duty as a League to take further action in the matter. After various plans had been submitted and discussed, it was unanimously decided to send a committee of delegates to Albany to receive and escort him, in conjunction with the Reception Committee, to his residence in this city; and Daniel E. Ryan, Mrs. D. E. Ryan, Eugene Macdonald, Wm. Peck, and Edward Searing were appointed such committee. It was also decided to giv Mr. Bennett a private reception and hav a League reunion and general jollification as soon after his return as convenient, and Chas. Andrews, D. E. Ryan, George E. Macdonald, and H. J. Thomas were appointed a committee to arrange the details of the reception. Much enthusiasm was manifested.

Comstock in Chicago.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Comstock lectured in this city on last Sabbath evening, the 5th inst., to an audience of "gentlemen only." He did not giv an exhibition of his plunder, giving as a reason for not doing so, in substance, that no one, regardless of age or moral fortitude, could look at his collection and remain pure or untainted—"You cannot handle pitch and not soil your fingers." In reply to a question asked by one of the audience, "If such was a fact, how it was that he (Comstock) had remained pure, considering his intimate relations for several years past with so large an amount of the vile stuff?" he replied that it was through the agency of prayer and the grace of God that he was kept unsullied and spotless.

Query: Admitting that he stated the truth about this matter, will not his exhibitions before congressional committees and ministers' meetings account for the immoralities of some of our government officials and the lecherous conduct of so many ministers of the gospel? We would recommend that the Society for the Suppression of Vice suppress him.

Respectfully, READER.

To benefit our readers and help sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER we make the following offers:

For Five Dollars

We send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and either of the following $3 books:

"The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." By D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Enlarged and revised.

"The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions." By D. M. Bennett. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present.

"Analysis of Religious Belief." By Viscount Amberley.

"The Great Works of Thomas Paine Complete."

"Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated."

For Six Dollars

We send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and "Supernatural Religion; An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation."

For Four Dollars

We will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and either of the following $1.50 works:

"The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure." By W. R. Greg, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc.

"Paine's Theological Works." In one volume, comprising "Age of Reason," "Examination of Prophecies," "Reply to Bishop Llandaff," "Letter to Mr. Erskine," "Essay on Dreams," "Of the Religion of Deism," etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine.

"Paine's Political Works." In one volume, comprising "Common Sense," "The Crisis" (Nos. I to XVI. inclusive), "The Rights of Man," and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait.

"The Heathens of the Heath." By William McDonnell, author of "Exeter Hall." A Radical romance.

"Beyond the Veil." A Spiritualistic work, said to be dictated by the spirit of Paschal Beverly Randolph, aided by Emanuel Swedenborg and others, through the mediumship of Mrs. Frances H. McDougall and Mrs. Luna Hutchinson.

"A Few Words About the Devil." By Charles Bradlaugh.

"Nathaniel Vaughan." A novel. By Frederika Macdonald.

For Three Dollars and Fifty Cents

We will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and either of the following $1 books:

"Question Settled: A Careful Comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism." By Moses Hull.

"The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion." A debate between Rev. G. H. Humphrey, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

"Proceedings and Addresses at the Freethinkers' Convention," held at Watkins, New York, August 22, 23, 24, and 25, 1878.

"Truth Seeker Tracts." Bound Volumes I., II., III., IV., and V. These volumes, containing over 520 pages each, are made up of over one hundred Truth Seeker Tracts. They embrace a variety of subjects by different authors, written in a terse, trenchant, and spicy style.

"Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures." By D. M. Bennett. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader.

"Contrast: Evangelicalism and Spiritualism Compared." This new work, by Mr. Hull, is designed as a companion to the "Question Settled."

"Issues of the Age." By Henry C. Pedder.

For Three Dollars and Twenty-five Cents

We will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and either of the following 50 cent books, bound in paper:

"The Crisis." By Thomas Paine. Containing Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive. Written in the "times that tried men's souls" during the Revolutionary War.

"The Underwood-Marples Debate." Between B. F. Underwood, of Boston, and the Rev. John Marples, of Toronto, Ontario. Held at Napanee, Ontario, in July, 1875.

"Interrogatories to Jehovah." By D. M. Bennett.

"Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science."

"The Burgess-Underwood Debate." Between Prof. O. A. Burgess, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Indiana, and B. F. Underwood, of Boston, Massachusetts.

"Which: Spiritualism or Christianity?" A friendly correspondence between Moses Hull, Spiritualist, and W. F. Parker, Christian.

"The Darwins" By Mrs. E. D. Slenker, author of "Studying the Bible," "John's Way," and numerous essays.

"The Priest in Absolution."

"The Mother of Harlots; or, Popery Dissected." Being an inside view of the enormities of the Romish church in Europe and America, and taken from authentic sources.

"The Popes and Their Doings; or, the Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God." A succinct history of some of the blackest criminals the earth has ever borne.

"Auricular Confession and Nunneries." By William Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A most important book.

"Maria Monk: the Mysteries of a Convent; or, Monks and their Maidens."

"Advancement of Science."

Be Watchful.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am rejoiced to learn that Bro. Bennett is going to hav a reception worthy of the hero and the cause which he has so gallantly championed. Mr. Parton's letter of the 20th ult. is grand. With such an indorsement Mr. Bennett can well afford to smile at the venomous snarlings of his pious foes. Let us not deceive ourselves. The struggle has but just begun. Every shade of unpopular thought is to be suppressed if possible. The imprisonment of E. H. Heywood and D. M. Bennett, of McDonnell and Kearney, are all inspired by the same Christly-Republican spirit of vindictive hatred of the free expression of opinion. Be watchful.

Norway, Iowa. E. C. WALKER.

Notes and News from Iowa.

MR. POTTER reports League No. 164, at Harlan, as prospering finely.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and other loyal papers, hav hosts of friends in this state.

CIRCULATE the anti-Comstock law petition. Roll in the names by the hundreds of thousands.

MRS. FOLLET'S "Libra Dawn," in the Le Claire Pilot, is becoming very interesting and instructive, and should hav a large circulation.

MRS. S. H. LAKE has been delivering a course of lectures at Maquoketa to crowded houses. She has now spoken there several times, and is doing much for the cause.

PROF. O. A. PHELPS talks of coming into Iowa during the summer. If he does, we should keep him here for several months and stir up the dry bones of old orthodoxy.

ANOTHER Liberal victory at Farley in electing members of the school board. Take courage, friends. Organize and work. Disguise the fact as we may, a crisis is imminent.

A NEW petition for the equalization of taxation will be ready for distribution in due time, and the state is being organized by counties and townships as rapidly as possible.

AMONG the good workers at Toledo, Tama county, I found W. Riecloff, J. E. Frick, E. S. Beckley, Chas. Emmerling, C. H. Stiner, and others. They are earnest friends of the League and take no stock in the "Consensus."

AN application for a charter for a League at Manchester, Delaware county, has just been forwarded to the National Secretary. To Bro. J. W. Schelling is due the credit of securing the twenty names attached to this application.

OUR Legislature passed a prohibitory amendment, but defeated the woman suffrage amendment, and refused to do anything for the taxation of church property. All reaction; no advance. But we must now prepare for the campaign of 1881-2.

MR. C. W. POTTER, President of auxiliary No. 164, has accepted the appointment as Chairman of Committee for Shelby county. He is an active worker and should receive the hearty assistance of all lovers of mental freedom in Shelby county. Address him at Harlan.

LET our friends everywhere do something on the 29th instant to commemorate the release of the hero, D. M. Bennett. He is this century's apostle of liberty, and no effort should be spared to recognize him as such and rebuke the traitors who deserted our cause in its hour of need.

M. W. ST. JOHN, George Howland, F. O. Otey, and Dr. R. Pierce are moving for a League at Cedar Falls. At Cedar Rapids a few of our live apostles are also trying to form a League. The Spiritualist society there has a free platform, but does not seem inclined to take hold of questions bearing upon the societary problems of the day. An effort is being made to secure Prof. Denton for a course of Radical and scientific lectures.

AT Tama City, Secularism has many advocates, prominent among whom I might mention C. W. Snyder, Thos. Carter, and C. M. Kingsbury. Belle Plain is moving to secure the services of Mrs. H. S. Lake for a course of lectures. Here we found some of the most wide-awake Secularists it has been our good fortune to meet. C. P. Hosmer, F. R. Zalesky, J. B. Marston, Joseph Schughart, and other good men, break the bread of life to the perishing children of superstition, one of whom, a venerable Quaker, informed us that any man who did not believe in a "supreme being" had no right to vote, to testify in a court of justice, or enjoy any other of the rights of the citizen. He has probably forgotten the history of the persecutions of the Quakers in this and other countries by the believers in said "supreme" myth.

THE Liberal League of Northern Iowa is daily increasing in numbers and influence. We had the great pleasure of attending its monthly meeting at Denver, on the 28th of March. Mr. Warren, Mr. Farrington, the writer, and others, spoke upon the grave issues of the day. It was a hopeful indication of the "better times coming" to see Materialists and Spiritualists meeting upon the same platform and harmoniously discussing subjects of vital importance to human welfare. This League has a fine choir, and the "Truth Seeker Collection" is the "hymn-book" used. Miss Delia R. Farrington presided at the organ with accomplished ease and efficiency. In this League of over two hundred and forty members it would seem invidious to particularize any, but we know that Mr. Farrington, Col. M. E. Billings, W. P. McCormack, M. W. St. John, Eli Barnes, Mary Emma Fisher, Mrs. A. N. Woods, and many others, are thoroughly devoted and earnest workers.

"Fernandez Day."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The calendar is emblazoned with the names of saints and sages. Great deeds carve their glowing records upon it, and memories big with the destiny of man enshrine it. This day is handed over to posterity by perhaps the grandest man in the nineteenth century, and does alike an honor to hostess and guest.

The occasion so worthy of a niche in the calendar was the presentation of a beautiful crayon likeness of Stephen Pearl Andrews to that gentleman, in behalf of his many admirers. On Monday evening last the elegant and hospitable residence of Mrs. Fernandez, 201 2d avenue, was the arena of intellect, wit, and beauty. At about 9 o'clock the veil was lifted from the picture, and the living subject greeted by a beautiful effort of eloquence and intellect from the lips of T. B. Wakeman. The gems of beauty and power in which it abounded need to hav been heard to be appreciated. It was one of Mr. Wakeman's best inspirations, and not unworthy of the heroic philosopher whose presence inspired it.

Mr. Andrews replied with great warmth and acumen. He outlined his career by reading the following extract from Sterling's "History of Philosophy," giving a view of a certain aspect of the doctrine of Frederick William Joseph Schelling, who was the preceptor of George Henry Lewes.

"Schelling says: In this revelation of history there are three periods. The first is that in which power reveals itself only as destiny, blindly holds down freedom, and destroys, coldly and unconsciously, all that is greatest and noblest. This is the Tragic Historical Period, a period of brilliancy, but of the disappearance as well as of the marvels of the old world and of its dynasties, of the noblest humanity that ever flourished.

"The Second Historical Period is that in which the former blind power manifests itself now as Mutuality (Nature), and the obscure law of necessity appears transformed into an open natural law [of Rights and Duties], compelling the unbridled caprice of individual will to obey a plan of universal culture, conducting, in the end to a union of the peoples, to a universal state. This period begins with the advance of the mighty Roman republic.

"The Third Period will be that in which what was fate and nature, in the former periods, will manifest itself as Providence [as a Universal Social Providence]; while the dominion of Fate and Nature will be seen to hav been but the imperfect beginnings of the gradual revelation of Providence. When this period will begin, it is impossible to say. But when it is, God is."

Mr. Andrews stated, with great feeling, in closing his response that his life work was to put that great idea of Schelling upon the stage of human development so that it might grow and become a living fact in the coming evolution of the race.

With becoming grace he then introduced to the company the artists who had done him so much credit, Miss L. E. Gardinier, Mr. Pickett, and Mrs. Varni, and then the hostess of the evening. It was at this point that the occasion was made historic by crowning it Fernandez Day.

After various recitations and speeches refreshments were in order, and these were in keeping with the charming hospitality of the place. Then more recitations and speeches followed, and the sociability drifted upon the midnight hour like a dream.

The press, the lyceum, the studio, and the stage were represented in the brilliant company which exchanged honors with Mr. Andrews. It was eminently enjoyable to be there, and all who shared these delightful hours will long treasure the dedication of Fernandez Day in the radiance of Andrews' glory.

Ingersoll in Napanee, Canada.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The long wished for opportunity to see and hear Col. Ingersoll came at last. Last night we had the supreme pleasure and satisfaction of taking the Colonel by the hand for the first time and of listening to his inimitable lecture on "Moses" in the Opera Hall, Napanee. Having two volumes of his lectures, I was of course well acquainted with his thought; but I longed to see the man and feel his warm grasp and listen to his eloquent tongue. This wish has been gratified; and the three or four hours' experience of last night will, as long as life lasts, be one of the most pleasing reminiscences of that life.

I had of course formed a mental image of Ingersoll as to his presence and characteristics on the platform, as we always do of great men whom we know through their writings but hav never seen. In some respects I was somewhat disappointed, while in others my mental portraiture and expectations were much exceeded by the reality. Col. Ingersoll is more eloquent than oratorical. He is not so great an orator as I had supposed, but is by far the most genuinely eloquent man I ever saw upon a platform. This may seem paradoxical, but there is quite a difference, in my estimation, between oratory and eloquence. Eloquence consists essentially in such qualities on the part of the speaker as produce perfect communion, intellectual and emotional, for the time being, between speaker and hearer.

In this respect Ingersoll is par excellence—eloquent—is the very quintessence of eloquence. His is the most eloquent tongue and presence I ever had the good fortune to see and hear on platform or stage. At one time the highest faculties of our nature are thrilled through and through by his eloquent pathos, while again we are moved to uncontrolable mirth by his inimitable wit and humor. With the exception of a tinge of provincialism, he has all the physical and mental prerequisites of a most powerful and model speaker—a splendid physique, with a predominance of the vital and mental temperaments, thus giving not only the most exquisite sensibility and pathos, but the vital energy to sustain these and to support the well-rounded intellectual and emotional brain. On the platform he is literally full of that personal magnetism and bonhomie which at once place speaker and hearer en rapport and in perfect communion.

As before remarked, Col. Ingersoll has considerable of the characteristic Americanism in his manner and speech, and a Canadian has no difficulty in determining his nationality after hearing him speak a few sentences. He is indeed a noble type of a man, as well as a representative American, of whom Americans may justly feel proud.

Mr. Ingersoll's Canadian tour comprises two lectures in Montreal, one in Napanee, one in Belleville, two in Toronto, and one in Ottawa. We greet him most cordially. May his shadow (which is by no means diminutive) never grow less! Yours very truly, ALLEN PRINGLE.

Book Notices.

BRAIN AND MIND; or, Mental Science Considered in Accordance with the Principles of Phrenology and in Relation to Modern Physiology. By Henry S. Drayton, A.M., and James McNeill. Illustrated. Extra cloth. One vol., 12 mo, pp. 334. $1.50. New York: S. R. Wells & Co., publishers, 737 Broadway.

On the title-page of this new volume is a sentiment which has a peculiar appropriateness, we think, in such a place, viz: "The greatest friend to Truth is Time, her greatest enemy is Prejudice, and her constant companion is Humility;" for with the lapse of time since Gall proclaimed first his new doctrines of mental philosophy, those doctrines hav steadily won their way into popular belief, and that in spite of prejudice, bigotry, and conservatism. The literature of phrenology is extensive, far beyond the conception of those who hav not given the subject personal consideration, being spread through a hundred or more volumes of magazines, European and American, and represented otherwise by hundreds of treatises on the whole of departments of the subject. It must be said, however, that within the past ten years or more no volume has been given to the world which presented a comprehensive view of the science and discussed its principles, not only on their philosophical side, but also on the side of their practical relations to the everyday life of man. This is probably due to the fact that the treatise or "System" of George Combe was deemed by many so complete that a new work was quite unnecessary. But Mr. Combe's book, however admirable, is old, and there hav been discoveries in physiology and changes in the views of metaphysicians which the "System" did not anticipate.

It was a recognition of such facts as these that set the authors of "Brain and Mind" to work to prepare a treatise on the relations of the thinking principle to its physical instrument, which would embody the well-established doctrines of phrenology and show their connection with the latest modern physiological thought.

A careful examination of this well-written and beautifully-illustrated work must convince any one that the aim to be "explicit and clear in its definitions," and at the same time to render its teaching "thoroughly practical," has been kept steadily in view. Whether a reader be inclined to believe phrenology or not, he must find the volume a mine of interest and gather many suggestions of the highest value, and rise from its perusal with clearer views of the nature of mind and the responsibilities of human life. The work constitutes a complete text-book on the subject.

MUSCLE-BEATING; or, Active and Passive Home Gymnastics, for Healthy and Unhealthy People. By C. Klemm, Manager of the Gymnastic Institution in Riga. With ten Illustrations. M. L. Holbrook & Co.

This book contains the following interesting chapters: Introduction; Historical Review; Value of Muscle-Beating as an Indoor Gymnastic; Directions for the Special Use of Muscle-Beating; The Muscle-Beater; Cold Hands and Feet; Morbid Concentrations; Excessive Fatness; Muscular Debility; The Weakness of Advanced Years and Infirmities of Old Age; Lameness and Stiff Articulations; Morbid Mental Excitement; Sleeplessness; Incipient Diseases of the Spinal Cord; Paralysis; Rheumatism; Cold; Gouty Tumors; Neuralgic Headache; Vertigo; Loss of Hair; Muscular Curvature of the Spine; Muscle-Beating as a Means of Sustaining the Health; Summary of Directions for the Use of Muscle-Beating.

The work is a novelty and very suggestive. We should not wonder if it would prove a valuable edition to the numerous modes of exercise, especially for chronic invalids and sedentary persons. Price 30 cents. For sale at this office.

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY. By F. E. Aspinwall. We hav just completed this admirable little work for the author and now hav it on sale. It contains a map of the head with all of the qualities plainly marked, also a classified list of the faculties. It is a very useful work for students in this science, as well as interesting for those not versed in the technical phraseology. Price, bound in cloth, 75 cents, in paper, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

National Medical Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you be so kind as to giv the following a place in your valuable paper, and oblige a Freethinker in medicine? I propose to call in convention all free and independent physicians of every creed or school of medicine, to meet in Chicago on the 22d of June, 1880. I hav already means in hand to meet current expenses. What I now want is simpiy the name and address of physicians—men and women—in parts of the United States known to be free from the handcuffs of "old regular medicine," that I may address a circular to them, setting forth the reasons, merits, and the necessity of such an organization. I may be addressed at Minneapolis, Minn., until the 30th of this month, April, 1880. Let all who read this please respond promptly. Yours truly,

Minneapolis, Minn. DR. J. STOLZ.

THE Californian for April contains: The Story of Australia and New Zealand, The Hermit of Treasure Peak, Pallas, Shepherds and Sheep-herding, At Agua Tibia, Americanism in Literature, Captain Molly, The Ethics of Suicide, Our Ophidian Friend, Notable Autographs, Ruby, Arizona, A Glimpse of the Unusual, Outcroppings.

The Creation.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: All that can be claimed for the Mosaic account of the creation is that it is assumed evidence. True, Moses declared it to be the word direct from God, but we can honor this assertion only as we giv credence to the truth and veracity of that man.

Since science has demonstrated that many of the conditions named are not only inconsistencies but impossibilities, the assumption that it is divine is a false premise; and if it is not divine, what assurance is there, then, that it is in the least degree the truth?

Let us note some points from Genesis. The universe was created in six days. Some Christians claim that "days" mean "epochs," or long periods of time; but I differ from them, since the sun was made to shine by day, the moon by night. Evidently the author of Genesis was impressed with the idea that the local day and night were characteristics of the universe as well as of the earth, and the "days" mean our literal days.

To the universe there is no such thing as day or night, and to the earth prior to the existence of any other planet, from which the earth might receive light, it is equally impossible. In fact, there could be no light except from the heat of the earth itself, and such a condition destroys the darkness that is assumed to hav existed before the light. Light and darkness are only terms used to represent different degrees of the same results of condition in matter, and to imagine darkness without light is like cold without heat. Light and darkness must be co-existent. When asked to clear up this little discrepancy, Christians only take refuge behind that miserable childish pretext, which the Bible itself denies, that "with God all things are possible."

God gathers the waters together in one day. Imagine, if you can, a current running at sufficient speed to carry the waters from the Eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains to the Gulf of Mexico in twelve hours, or from the high lands of Siberia, across the "Garden of Eden," to the Indian Ocean. Fifty miles an hour is a terrible speed for a locomotive engine, but double, or thrice double that speed, and how irresistible would be the torrent, how mighty the clash as the surging masses met in the great basin which now form the ocean's bed!

On the third day we hav vegetation growing without the sun. Light is a prerequisite to vegetable life. If the heat of the earth was the source of its own light, it must hav been a warm climate for vegetation.

On the fourth day the lights were placed in the firmament to divide the light from the darkness. There had been three days previous to this without these lights, but the "unchangeable" God saw wherein he could improve the light business. He wanted some system about the matter, and it was well he did, for if this light business were so arranged that we could turn it on and off at pleasure, the state of affairs would be terrible. There would be a continual wrangle between the gas companies and the people, while electric light stock would be worth less than the repudiated Mississippi state bonds.

God made the sun to giv light by day. The light of the sun makes the day, and it is day all the time. Day or night to an omnipresent God is an idea too ridiculous to merit even a passing notice. God made the moon to govern the night, and I guess the reason we call her feminine is because she is not content to labor in her own sphere of usefulness, but persists in encroaching upon the sun, which she always does to the neglect of her own duties. The divisions of time which we call day and night are only local, and the idea that those terms hav anything to do with the universe, or any significance beyond this earth, is an error too palpable to be excused even in the most illiterate. If God placed the stars in the heavens to giv light to the earth, why did he place billions of them so far away that their light can never possibly reach the earth?

Let us pass the remainder of the creation. Next we find man and woman in the Garden of Eden; man and woman fresh from the hand of God; man and woman with no knowledge of sin or of good and evil. The serpent, which was the most subtle of all that was good, and which God had blessed, and with which he was pleased, tempted the woman to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, and the woman induced the man to eat. Then God became angry and condemned the man, the woman, and the serpent. Now the man had not sinned. True, God told him to refrain from eating of that particular fruit, but Adam, since he had no knowledge of good or evil, did not know it was wrong to disobey God. It is the intention with which an act is committed that constitutes its criminality, and there is no moral law in existence which can be so construed as to hold Adam guilty of a misdemeanor if he had no knowledge of good and evil, which consideration is virtually admitted in the twenty-second verse of the third chapter of Genesis. But after he had acquired that knowledge we find him bravely telling his angry God the truth in the matter; but God, unlike the father of Washington, was afraid of the man who could tell the truth (the antipathy in which the "chosen few" hold the truth would imbue one with the idea that God still hated the possessors of that great gift), and condemned him to banishment. The woman was to be ruled over by the man (that was before the broomstick administration, I guess), and the snake was to crawl on the ground. The Bible fails to tell what means of locomotion the serpent possessed prior to this time, and givs but little encouragement to the noble women who are demanding the just right of equal suffrage with the men.

According to John the Evangelist (Rev. iv, 11) God made the world and all things for his pleasure. Is there pleasure in repentance, that God should repent having made man? Was there pleasure in fearing that man would partake of the fruit of the tree of life, and "become as one of us?" Will God permit the people of this day to partake of that "tree" after refusing Adam? Has God altered his intentions toward man? If he has, is he unchangeable?

I hav tried to lay before you a few points connected with the Mosaic account of the creation, not because I believe them, nor because I think any sane person who has the least knowledge of science can believe them, but to lay before you the abominable trash the church would hav fostered as the direct word of an all-wise creator of the universe.

Christians claim to foster and cherish science. There is not a branch of science but conflicts with this creation; but I leave the philosopher, the astronomer, the geologist, and other scientists, to combat it from that standpoint. I hav attempted to meet it only upon the ground of reason.

The church is unanimous in the declaration that Infidels are not deep thinkers, and that all the wise heads are on the side of the church. Be this as it may, but if "deep thinking" requires one to gulp down this contaminated and depraved mass of infamous incongruities they call the Bible then I heartily rejoice that I am a shallow thinker.

The Bible is no more divine than Gil Blas, and not half so accurate. The man who was the author of Genesis believed the world to be flat, and I venture the assertion he was never one hundred miles from his birthplace. He imagined the blue empyrean to be a vast body of water, and I challenge any "deep thinker" in the church to giv any other plausible explanation of the seventh verse of the first chapter of Genesis. Yet this is the stuff which must be dragged into the school-room. That book, which says man was damned for seeking knowledge, in the school-room! "O consistency, thou art a jewel!"

The reason why the masses of Christians are believers is because they hav never given any attention to the Bible themselves, but accept it because of its antiquity, and because of the opinion of all the "wise" men. The antiquity of the Bible can be no proof of its veracity. There was a time when it was not ancient, and what it was then it is now, for time cannot detract from its error nor add to its truth. As to all the wise men being Christians, I deny the assertion. The unlettered class hav a great respect for high-sounding language—something they do not comprehend; therefore they find relief in the views of the "great theologians," which views are understood by neither their authors themselves nor the people to whom they are given. I hav noticed that the more intricate and inexplicable the mass of unintelligible theology, the greater honor and reverence it brings to its author, for while no "doctor of divinity" understands the views of his fellow-theologists, he is afraid to admit it, lest he expose his own ignorance. It matters not if every man, woman, and child, every potentate upon the throne, every "divine" in the pulpit, declare the Bible to be the true word, its truth is none the more proved, and I can accept it only as the work of men, probably of monks, who lived not ten centuries ago.

One of those great English philosophers and divines, John Wilkin, who lived near the middle of the seventeenth century, conceived the idea of flying to the moon: "Because," said he, "a little bird can fly upward some distance, I believe a flying chariot can be made which would fly to the moon." Sir John must hav been a "deep thinker."

Another great philosopher of the same century said, "Since man can create some imperfect things which were not pre-existent, God, who is perfect, can create great things." If that man intended to convey the idea that man can create matter that was not pre-existent, I am willing that he too be classed with the "deep thinkers."

Still another "D.D." of that beautifully little isle, which has practiced every imaginable form of tyranny in the name of the church, strongly advocated the study of natural philosophy, forgetting that the idea of a material (and I deny the existence, except as the results and conditions of matter, of that which is immaterial), omnipresent God was directly contrary to the first principle of that great science—that no two bodies can occupy the same space at the same time. But then he was a "deep thinker."

Schuyler, the logician, argues that God made sin so that there would be a virtue in morality. God condemns nine hundred and ninety-nine and saves one. The beauty of this plan of salvation can be discerned only by a "deep thinker."

Cotton Mather and the acursed tribunal which executed those persons at Salem, in free America, were the elite of "deep thinkers." Imagine Cotton Mather basking away the ceaseless ages of eternity, in the fluted folds of Abraham's bosom.

Did space permit, we could mention hundreds of kindred instances of the matchless "wisdom" emanating from those great intellectual monstrosities, the "deep thinkers."

One more point. Christians assert that Infidels look at but one side of this great question. A few facts prove this statement to be false, and demonstrate that it is the Christian who sees but one side. About nine-tenths of the Infidels of to-day are children of Christians, and were taught from their earliest infancy, until they became the servants of their own reason, to respect and honor the Bible. Youth is the time in which the lasting impressions of a life are made. In politics the son follows in the footsteps of the father; and what would be more natural in religion? But from the Christian children come the Infidels. There can be no motive for giving up one's religion, as taught them in youth, except in answer to the knocking of reason, since that religion is popular, and he who opposes it does so at the risk of bread and reputation. Instead of Infidels looking upon but one side, they are the only ones who hav been permitted to see both sides. In every Infidel family I dare say the Bible can be found. In not one family in ten among the Christians can I find any work on Infidelity. I doubt if there be an Infidel in the United States but has heard the gospel preached. Not one Christian in ten has ever heard an Infidel lecture. Every hour in the day those who liv in the cities can hear the church bells, while one day in every seven is set apart for their benefit. Every village in this land can boast of a clergyman. Millions of people every Sunday assemble in Sunday-schools to impress upon the children the importance of piety. In every school-book the name of God is reverenced; yet when a man rises above all these, and can discern the truth, the weak-minded bigots, who hav never been permitted to look beyond the narrow confines of their own selfish natures, hav the impudence, in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary, to say that he has never looked at but one side of the question.

But this is one of their "arguments," and it reminds me of what a friend said to me was the reason why Christians insisted upon calling Colonel Ingersoll "Bob." He said they could not meet his arguments, but there was a world of consolation in calling him "Bob."

"But," says one, "if the Bible is not the true account of the creation, what is the true account?"

I hav heard the same argument used in regard to the moon. "If it is not made from green cheese, what is it made from?" And the latter question I think is the more difficult to answer.

But the Infidel has his God and his Bible. His God is nature, his Bible her own handwriting—in the mountains, furrowed with deep canyons, where the geologist reads that the world, through countless ages, has exisited; in the volcanoes, those great chimneys to that internal heat which melts the rocks away and causes the earth to tremble in convulsion; in the mighty ocean, tossing and raging, lashing its rock-bound shores like a wild beast in a cage; in the mighty frozen fields of ice, where crystal glaciers stand like granite monuments of decades forever past.

The Infidel hears his God speak in the mutterings of the earthquake, in the howlings of the tempest, in the cold, bleak winds of the north, and his whisperings in the gentle zephyrs, which, laden with the ambrosial fragrance of orange groves, wafts along the soft south wind until it has kissed the northern hills; in the rippling brook, hurrying over the shiny pebbles on to the great blue sea; in the woodland, the somber vale and silent dell. The flowers, the trees, the singing birds, all tell of a God, but not of a Jehovah who made the universe for himself and man alone.

In all these the Infidel learns of the creation, history, and the law of earth; but his Bible is so written that it can be read only when the enlightenment of the world had risen above the mythology of the Greeks, the superstitions of the Nile, the omens of the Aztecs, the prognostications of Palestine, the bigotry of Rome, and the fanaticism of modern Christianity.

Non-Resistance.

The National Citizen and Ballot-Box, edited by Mrs. M. J. Gage, an able advocate of woman's suffrage, is giving some very interesting reminiscences of the early meetings held by the advocates of that just cause. In a late number of the Citizen an anecdote of Mr. Garrison is given, which shows the advantage of philosophical coolness over ministerial bigotry and priestly zeal. We subjoin the paragraph for the amusement of our readers:

In a debate on the Bible position of woman, Mr. Garrison, having always been a close student of that book, was so clear in his positions, and so ready in his quotations, that he carried the audience triumphantly with him.

The Rev. Dr. Nevin came out of the contest so chagrined that, losing all sense of dignity, on meeting Mr. Garrison in the vestibule of the hall at the close of the convention, he seized him by the nose and shook him vehemently. Mr. Garrison made no resistance, and when released, he calmly surveyed his antagonist and said, "Do you feel better, my friend? Do you hope thus to break the force of my argument?" The friends of the Rev. Mr. Nevin were so mortified with his ungentlemanly behavior that they suppressed the scene in the vestibule as far as possible in the Cleveland journals, and urged the ladies who had the report of the convention in charge to make no mention of it in their publication.

Happily, the fact has been resurrected in time to point a page of history.

The above statement, which I find commented upon in the Investigator, is a very pretty story. As it tells so nicely for our side, it is a pity to spoil it, and I would not take pains to do it were not the truth of the matter just as good.

The facts are that the first National Woman's Rights Convention was held in Cleveland, Ohio, in October, 1853. It announced a free platform to opponents as well as advocates. The Rev. Dr. Nevin, of Cleveland, Ohio, occupied a part of one morning's session in opposing woman's rights and woman's suffrage. Joseph Barker, a noted Infidel of that day, and a solid, sledge-hammer Boanerges of a speaker, followed Dr. Nevin and began replying rather elaborately to the reverend speaker. Mr. Garrison, who, I think, was chairman of the meeting—at all events he was a prominent actor and speaker there—as soon as he observed that Barker was about to occupy his time in reply to Nevin, arose, stepped forward on the platform, and said: "Oh, never mind him, Bro. Barker; his speech is not worth noticing;" and then with raised finger, and in a voice that thundered through the hall, added, "he is evidently only a blackguard and a rowdy." There was silence that could be felt for half a minute in the hall after that utterance. Then came a storm of hisses—answered by cheers from his friends. It almost took away the conventional breath. Bro. Barker, however, gathered himself slowly up, picked out another thread for his discourse, and went on. Garrison's interruption was a bold and stunning blow, right in the face of a Cleveland audience, at the most popular clergyman in their own city; but everything went forward in order till the adjournment of the morning session. Then, while the audience were passing out, and while the speakers, reporters, and others were still standing in groups upon the platform, a brother of Dr. Nevin—a merchant, I think, or at all events in business in Cleveland—stepped from the audience upon the platform, seized Garrison by the nose, and gave it a vigorous tweak. Then this brother Nevin immediately left the platform and the hall. Indeed, he left so rapidly, and it was such a sudden surprise to Garrison, that he had no time to make a reply at all; at any rate, I heard none. The incident was telegraphed all over the United States, was published in hundreds of newspapers, and there was no attempt at hushing it up.

This is the recollection of the undersigned, who was the official reporter of the convention. Lucy Stone, Lucretia Mott, Antoinette L. Brown Blackwell, Ernestine L Rose, and other members of that convention, are still living, and their memories of that exciting occasion cannot be far different from mine. Let the fact "be resurrected" in its own proper form if it is to "point a page of history."

Letters from Friends.

WEST NEWTON, MASS., March 1, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed post-office order for $3.25, which pays my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER up to Jan. 1, 1881. I claim to be a Liberal Spiritualist, and I believe in giving to every man and woman the same rights which I claim for myself, whether they be Gentile or Jew, Spiritualist, orthodox, Methodist, or Catholic. Every person should hav the right to their own opinion and a right to express their opinion publicly if they choose, provided they use proper language in their expression.

All, or nearly all, who write for your paper profess to be Liberals, and yet how condemnatory many of those writers are of those who do not think and believe just as they do! Now (as our ministers would say), "for Christ sake," if we are Liberals, or even Christians, let us beware how we judge or condemn our fellow beings. Let us by kind deeds and loving words assist our erring brothers and sisters whom we may think to be wrong to climb the ladder of progression by extending to them the hand of charity instead of backbiting and slandering because they are unable to think as we do.

I wish our President had just a little of the Christ spirit in his body, enough so he would be willing to do by you as he would wish to be done by. Then how quickly you would be set at liberty. But never mind, brother, time will soon do it, and you will stand head and shoulders above R. B. Hayes in the estimation of thinking people.

GIV US FREEDOM.

Who dares to speak for truth and right,
In this progressive age,
And strike the plowshare deep in search,
Invites the bigot's rage.

And racks of torture are resumed,
With sacks of serpents too;
And eyes bored out by Christian men,
And all their hate can do.

Ah! they would build a scorching fire,
And pile the fagots high,
And cast reformers' bodies there,
And never heed one cry.

Smiting their ashes 'neath their feet,
Proud of this damning deed;
Then shout for God and Christ to bless
And all the hungry feed.

Build their grand churches higher still,
And wear a longer face;
Say blessings o'er their daily bread,
And rob the human race.

Ask us to come to Christ, and lay
Our heads upon our breast;
To cast our burdens at his feet,
And feel that we are blest.

But if we fail to come their way,
Alas! but who dares tell?
They curse us with a bitter curse,
And send us straight to hell.

But let us tremble not, nor fear,
For God is God the same,
And we are one with him in care,
Truth's car rolls on the same.

Though into prison we are cast,
We stand behind the bars,
And testify to higher truth
Than comes of conquering wars.

'Tis not an ignominious fate,
Nor need those bow in shame
Whose martyr'd hearts hav tortured been
In freedom's holy name.

Then let us dare to speak the truth,
And liv the best we can,
For God is God, and we can trust
To him the souls of men.

Fraternally yours, CHAS. N. WOOD.

BURR OAK, MICH., Feb. 26, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I was much rejoiced and relieved from great anxiety on reading your "Seventh Letter from Albany" in regard to your health, for which I had become quite alarmed, not only for your sake, but for that of the Liberal cause in general, lest truth and reason was about to lose its great defender and champion through bigoted hypocrisy and perjury. It fairly made my heart leap for joy to know you were yourself again and in possession of so buoyant and cheerful a state of mind as the tenor of your letter denotes. Now don't, I beseech you, tax that fertile brain of yours too much, as I fear you hav in times past. I was also pleased and amused wherein you so aptly and justly set forth the striking similarity of Christ's better acts and sayings with those of your own, wherein you are quite dissimilar. Now please allow me to carry the contrast a little farther and name a few more points wherein you widely differ from said Jesus & Co.: You don't command those that hav no sword to sell their garment and buy one, as Christ did. You don't command your disciples to bring hither those that will not hav you to rule over them and slay them before you. Jesus did. You don't get wrathy and kill a fig-tree because it had no fruit on it in the winter. Jesus did. You don't make a great thong or walloping-rope out of small cords and fly at those in the house that don't please you and drive them all out. Christ did. You don't declare the stars shall fall from heaven and the world come to an end. Jesus did. You don't declare that any man that hates not his father and mother, his wife and children, and brothers and sisters, cannot be your disciple. Christ did. You don't tell your people to sell their carrion to strangers. God did. You don't kill a man for putting up his hand to steady an old box on an ox-cart to keep it from falling. God did. You don't get mad and slay fifty thousand three-score and ten harvest hands in a little field because one of them, through curiosity, raised the lid of the same old box on a cart being drawn this time by a pair of heifers. And I hope and trust that in your last expiring, even if on a Christian rack or surrounded by burning fagots, you will not, as Christ did, cry aloud, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? I might point out many other dissimilarities between you and the one in three and three in one, but I forbear.

I, with all the Liberals hereabout (who are not a few), hope the Board of Directors or other proper authority of the National Liberal League will call a convention the coming summer to make nominations of our own for President and Vice-President of the United States, which of course would be the immortal Bob at the head and Bennett next. Let us try our strength.

Please send me a few petitions for the taxation of church property and I will work like a beaver for signatures until our Legislature meets next winter.

Inclosed please find a small donation to greet you on your liberation from durance vile next May Day, which time draweth nigh. Fraternally yours, M. P. THURSTON.

CATHLAMET, WASH. TER.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: In the unavoidable absence of your highly worthy and erudite editor and publisher, I would deem myself unworthy of a very being did I not lift my pen to remonstrate against the unparalleled indignity that has, through priestly tyranny, been heaped upon Mr. Bennett, a man who but holds his life in his hands, as it were, that his fellows might enjoy theirs the more abundantly. Hours but glided too soon for him to tell of all their happiness attainable here—the paramount of all existence; and the midnight lamp without doubt often and again must hav disquieted him that time hath so stealthily encroached on his labors while he was so happily and earnestly engaged pleading at the bar of nature in behalf of his fellow-humanity. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of New York, that a band of followers of the meek and lowly Jesus of Nazareth banded together, did, in an inhuman and unbrotherly manner, place one of the most damnable deadfalls in a peaceful and placid way and thereby entrap him, and for which the historian of the nineteenth century will endeavor in vain to discover a parallel to hand down to posterity as one of the foulest blots that marks a nation's history. Well may they be ashamed, and that too beyond the power of redemption, while others can discern who—void of malice or bigotry—are as competent of judging in the premises as those who hav, while the world looks on in ghastly horror at the future inevitable record in so highly-cultured an epoch. Yet heaven forbid that we cast any reflection on any court of these United States and thus aim to prevent the law from taking its course and depriving the knavish priesthood from having a jollification, no matter how honest the man be who stands in need of verification. Meanwhile, if I mistake not, we liv under a government that guarantees to each and all the inalienable right to express their honest convictions touching anything whatsoever in nature calculated to further the moral, social, and scientific status of humanity. And like unto Jefferson, our father of the past (who, compared with to-day, is as the sun to a rushlight), who uttered these truly noble and magnanimous words, "That error of opinion might be tolerated while reason was left free to combat it." And this is as it should be, and yet shall be, as infallibility cannot be prescribed by law. But now the time draws nigh when the united Liberalism of the land will hav a fitting opportunity to publicly express their disapprobation in a manner not to be mistaken, that the liberty of the press and that of the people cannot much longer be tampered with with impunity.

H. A. ELLIOT.

WAYLAND, N. Y.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: A few days ago a well-dressed man entered my place of business and remained about half an hour without making his wants known. After a while he called for a pencil, and, after agonizing over a sheet of paper for ten or fifteen minutes, folded it closely, handed it to me, and hastened out of the door. The following is a literal copy of the hieroglyphics that I succeeded in deciphering by the time he had turned the corner on the next street:

"Mr. Morehouse, I understand you are an Infidel, but by your looks I don't believe it, and yet for fear that my eyes deceive me, I will ask you to pray for me, for I am an unworthy Christian. I am a strong believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, and I will pray for you. God help us both this pleasant day, and if we never meet on earth again may it be our exalted privilege to meet in heaven."

I afterward learned that the stranger was a colporteur, probably sent in by some kind Christian friend to convert this heathen. Now, I can't run worth a cent, and if it is ever my "exalted privilege" to meet him in heaven, and he is then as timid as he is now, there will be no show for me to overtake him inside the city limits. I shall not try to meet him there, but shall go to the other place with men who are not ashamed of their opinions and hav the courage of their convictions. I try to appreciate the confidence that led this "unworthy" Christian to ask for my prayers, but I shall make no special effort in this direction, for I hav no faith either in the special creation or in the spontaneous generation of backbone or brain. There is no hope for such as he except through generations of natural development, assisted by Liberal culture. Prayer, even the prayer of a Freethinker, cannot save him from his sad fate.

If Christians believe as they preach, why are they so indifferent and lukewarm? They claim that the vast majority of their friends, their relatives, and of the brotherhood of man, are blindly rushing to eternal punishment, to endless burning. The danger is imminent. Every instant their dearest ones are made fuel for the avenging fire. Why do they not fly to the rescue? Think of a man trying to rescue helpless children from a burning dwelling by writing on a piece of wrapping-paper, and then dodging out! They all do it. None are thoroughly in earnest except those who, because of a vivid belief, hav become inmates of insane asylums. The masses do not really believe the doctrines. If any kind Christian mother was asked by a trusted friend if she thought her loved but unconverted son or daughter was in the great danger so vividly portrayed by revivalists, she would answer no. Hell is not for them, but for strangers. Then the masses are lukewarm because of unbelief. And there is hope for the cause of truth and progress, for unbelief is growing, whether in churches or out. The truest believers are those fit for asylums. Then there are many, very many—and this is the saddest fact of all—who profess to believe because it pays. It pays the preacher, it pays the professional man, the merchant, the politician, those who need the support of the popular church-going throng to compass their points. Many drift along from force of inherited tendency and habit, without ever thinking clearly on the subject. Many who do think, yet continue to drift with the current through love of ease or fear of loss, are hypocrites.

Look it over any way you choose, these are facts. Is it, then, any wonder, that Christians generally, as we find them, are about as lukewarm as is the colporteur who gave me my text? G. W. MOREHOUSE.

PORT JERVIS, N. Y., March 28, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Inclosed you will find $1.50, for which please send me one copy of "Some Mistakes of Moses," by R. G. Ingersoll, and one copy of the "Advancement of Science," by Tyndall.

Permit me to remark that your paper is doing a grand missionary work in Port Jervis and vicinity in the interest of Freethought, and that it is a welcome visitor among us. It is exactly the paper needed to drive out superstition and darkness, and Liberalism is growing rapidly under its benign influence. New members are added to the Liberal ranks and new advocates are coming forward in favor of Freethought and free speech, in spite of clerical influence. But other agencies hav also been at work at the same time to bring about those results, and there is a complete revolution in modes of thought and a grand change in the public mind. Among these are the public discussions on religious questions by distinguished gentlemen from abroad. About a year ago Mr. B. F. Underwood delivered a lecture here on the "Influence of Christianity on Civilization," before a large and intelligent audience. It had a great effect, because it attracted not only the attention of the people, but, in particular, the attention of the clergy. Shortly after Mr. Underwood's departure the conference of the Methodist church held their session in this place, and one of the members of this conference, Rev. Mr. Gill, challenged Mr. Underwood to a public discussion. The challenge was promptly accepted, and both gentlemen met a few weeks afterward in this village, made preliminary arrangements, and the subject of discourse was agreed upon. It was, "Is there a personal deity? and is the Bible an inspired volume?" Gill took the affirmative, Underwood the negative. I don't need to tell you that Mr. Gill came out second best, to the great sorrow of all superstitious people, and to the complete satisfaction of all Liberals. But the struggle between Freethought on one side and superstition on the other did not end there, because the clergy, fortified behind the cowards' desks, could not afford to rest quietly under defeat, so they pitched bravely into Mr. Underwood after his departure, and the consequence was that he returned, and in one lecture settled their hash pretty well. Some other speakers, among whom I wish to mention Mrs. Lawrence, Mrs. Leck, Rev. Mr. Holmes, of England, and Dr. Brown, of Binghamton, hav favored us with addresses, all of which were to the point, and were listened to with marked attention by large audiences. The clergy seem to hav given up the fight. Two of them hav resigned their positions. One of them remarked that it was impossible to keep up a congregation when there were six hundred persons going to hear an Infidel preach. The name of this reverend is Mr. Rosecranz. Rev. William McKinney did not giv any reason for going away; but he intends to go to Europe and lecture on "Church Life in America." He is an intelligent gentleman, and never took any active part in the opposition against Liberalism. But the strangest case to be remarked upon is the death of Dr. Crane, the pastor of the Methodist church. Sunday evening he preached a strong sermon against Infidelity, and the next morning at ten o'clock he died suddenly with a paralytic stroke. If he had been an Infidel it would hav been reckoned as a deserved punishment from heaven.

Excuse me for the length of this letter. Next Monday we will hav a lecture by Col. Ingersoll, which we all hope will be a grand success.

We are all anxious to hear of Mr. Bennett's return home; meanwhile believe me

Your friend and brother in Freethought,
THOS. GARDNER.

GREAT VALLEY, N. Y., Mar. 29, 1880.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: Inclosed you will find two dollars, for which please send me "Superstition in all Ages," by John Meslier; also, "An Open Letter to the St. John's School Board," by M. Babcock, and "Advancement of Science."

There are many Liberals in these parts who are looking forward with buoyant spirits to the day of D. M. Bennett's deliverance from that Christian hell, where they thought to suppress not only himself but the principles of liberty, Freethought, free speech, and free mails, which are the very props of all free governments, and which make the American government superior to all other governments—the asylum and home of the oppressed of all other nations.

The apparent indifference of American people to the encroachments of the slimy monster is attributable to the fact that they hav been cradled in the lap of fond security and soothed by the lullaby song so oft repeated. Yet methinks there is life and health enough left, when once awakened to the situation of things in the body politic, both political and theological, to catch the villain and to extract his teeth, expose his slimy, hideous carcass, to the great disgust and regret of every hater of free government, and to the great joy of every lover of the same. In fact, I almost feel its knotty coils relax and hear its dying groans. It has no virtue, no arguments or history, to present in self-vindication; so let us bury it low and write its epitaph: "Here lies all that is left of old theology, always weak, though strong in the imagination of superstitious and ignorant people, exposed and buried by D. M. Bennett and his army of staunch Freethinkers."

Yours truly, A. F. ALBRIGHT.

WILLIAMSTOWN, PA, March 17, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find five dollars, two dollars for the "Bible of Bibles," two dollars for your forthcoming work on the gods (I don't know the price of it, but if it is more than two dollars I will make it right the next time), and one dollar for Mrs. Bennett. I had not decided to hav the book until I learned by your vision or visionary dream what a commotion it is making in the upper realms, and concluded it must be worth reading and possessing by us of this lower world as a memento of your prison work.

When I read of your failing health and sleepless nights alone there in that gloomy prison cell, my sympathies are more deeply stirred than ever; and I hav thought, Oh, how unfeeling are Mr. and Mrs. Hayes to disregard the tears and entreaties of your afflicted wife! I am much rejoiced to learn that your health has improved, and earnestly hope you will be sustained in body and mind and come out of your cruel and unjust confinement with renewed vigor, instead of being crushed out, to wield heavy blows against wrong and oppression in any form. Yours sincerely,

ROBERT SEAVER.

PITTSBURGH, PA., March 11, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I want to express my thoughts in regard to Thomas Paine, not only this, but my opinion of priesthood with their slanderous tongue so often quoted. The idea that Paine was afraid to die! Why? Had he ever burned anybody, or put anybody in prison? Did he ever tear human flesh? Is there a preacher or priest in the United States that has done as much for mankind as this great man did? I should think preachers and priests would keep their mouths closed in regard to Paine. That man of brains, that man of truth, must he be so slanderously abused by cowardly bigots? Is it possible to conceive that the human mind is thus inflamed? If I were to be damned this very day for expressing my opinion, I would stand up like a man and tell them to go on with their dirty work. Religion has lost its faith, and is losing every day. What wonder? Each is accusing the other of being a fraud. That is the reason I left my church, never again to return to it. There will soon be a time when all wretchedness of doctrine will fade away forever, and the mind of man will receive the joy of love and hope to come. JULIUS WAGNER.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

GREEN, MICH., Mar. 26, 1880.

MR. CHARLES J. HERBOLD, Sir: Your notice, together with your compliments, received. THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 20th brought the bundle.

Sir Charles, it was fair in you to notify us before you came for us with your knife. Had you made a direct attack on us without giving us notice you might hav hurt somebody; but now we shall be on the lookout, and try to keep out of range—out of reach of that knife, I mean.

The man who would turn on his friends
With deadly intent, with a knife,
Is jist the most onginerous cus
That you ever heerd on in yer life.

Charles, you seem to feel as though you made a great sacrifice when you joined the Liberal League. If you made a greater sacrifice than the League did, then our judgment is not worth carrying around.

I think, Charles, you are a medium, and hope it is not for that kind of spirits that are usually kept in barrels. As a favor to you, when I hear that old John Calvin is around, and wants a medium, I would recommend you to him, feeling certain that your style would just suit him.

Your letter was such a peculiar one that it offended me awfully. Why, sir, when I was reading it I could not keep that old fable out of my mind about the ass that dressed himself up in a lion's skin to astonish the other asses. But, sir, they all saw right through the disguise just as soon as they heard his melodious voice.

You seem to think that Freethinkers are not bigoted. We vote that ticket, sir, and we think you about as destitute of bigotry as Moses was of cheek when he was bragging how meek he was.

You will pardon me for noticing your kind letter at all. I should not hav done it, only you seemed to hav such a burning friendship for me that I thought it would be gratifying to you to hear from me individually.

I will now take leave of you, Charles, till the day of the battle. I shall try to be early on the field, armed with a scoop-shovel, to assist in gathering up some of the bowels which you may succeed in letting out.

Yours for the wah, N. HUNT.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Feb. 29, 1880.

THE FOURTH ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.—WHERE SHALL IT BE HELD?

TO THE LIBERALS OF AMERICA: I am pleased to see the above question is being agitated. Will it not meet the views of many, very many, of our Eastern friends, and will it not giv great encouragement to our Western friends to hold it at Bismarck Grove, Kansas? We know the West is being settled with a class of Liberals whose hearts are as broad as the Western prairies. Will it not afford thousands an opportunity to visit the West? We must lend encouragement to our Western pioneers in Liberalism. Bismarck Grove is a beautiful place. It is surrounded by a lovely country. Let the people get up an excursion so cheap that thousands can go and meet there, and see the broad and fertile West, Let the people agitate this subject, to be prepared to work in unison and harmony for the greatest good to the greatest number. Such is my wish in this great movement. W.

GREEN SPRING, OHIO.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY, R. B. HAYES, Hon. Sir: I am an humble citizen of the county that knew you as a boy, that watched you in manhood, that took great pride in all your steps of advancement toward the honorable position you occupy as the head of the intelligent American citizens of these United States. Allow me to state that I hav been a worker in and for the great party of liberty—the party to whom you owe everything that you hav and are, the party that placed you in the highest position in the gift of this great nation.

Now, sir, I ask you, in all sincerity, are you willing to prostitute the great prerogative, the great power invested in you as Chief Magistrate of a free people, by holding that power for good from an inoffensive old man, D. M. Bennett? Are you willing to destroy the precarious unity of the Republican party by withholding said mercy in his case? Do you wish the defeat of the Hon. C. Foster in Ohio? Do you wish the defeat of the party that placed you in power? You can do it in no better way than by withholding your clemency from D. M. Bennett. Your forgetfulness of mercy and justice in his case is having a wide-spread influence in every state. Many secret organizations are already formed and being formed in Ohio, having for their object the defeat of the Republican party. They believe that the law which put D. M. Bennett in prison is a Republican measure, and are bound that their power shall be felt and respected at the ballot-box. This power, which is greater than many think it is, will not stop here, I fear, but will go on until the rights of all are respected before the law. Now, this will cause great national trouble, and this trouble is not far off unless something be done to stop it. I know that there are no idle threats in this case. They mean work, though the heavens fall. I love the party of liberty, the party of intelligence. I love the principles for which we fought. I love the dear old flag which givs us free passage into every port and harbor under the sun. I love the land of my Revolutionary fathers. I love the home of my youth. I love liberty, and this is why I come to you, my beau ideal of a freeman, asking that liberty may be extended to a persecuted, innocent old man, and for the good of all I pray that I ask not in vain. I hav the honor to be, Mr. President, Yours most respectfully, J. L. BROWN, M. D.

"IS MATERIALISM BIGOTRY?"

LOWELL, MICH., March 21, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER Mr. Charles J. Herbold seems very much excited over my criticism of Mr. Babcock's method of "canning spirits," and because I charge with bigotry a certain class of so-called Liberals who claim to be scientists. "Wounded birds will flutter;" and among the hundreds of materialistic bigots that infest this country, it would be strange if some were not hit. This time I shall use the word bigot advisedly; and I deliberately charge Mr. Charles J. Herbold with being a bigot of the rankest kind; likewise every other person who talks or writes as he does. I shall insist on calling things by their right names, and I do it in all charity and kindness. He doubtless does not realize the truth, or he would not flutter as he does; but "facts are stubborn things."

Webster defines bigotry as being "obstinate or blind attachment to a particular creed or to certain tenets; unreasonable zeal; a warmth in favor of a party, sect, or opinion; excessive prejudice." Now, if Mr. Herbold is not excessively prejudiced against Spiritualism, and if he does not talk obstinately and blindly; if he does not manifest the most inexcusable ignorance in regard to the facts that underlie, and the philosophy of Spiritualism, who Spiritualists are and what they do; if he does not use more assumption, presumption, and conceit than he ought to, then I confess I do not sufficiently understand the English language to comprehend what bigotry is after reading Webster's definition of it.

Henry M. Kiddle, whose scholarly and scientific attainments rank him among the first in the land, and whom we are proud of as a Spiritualist, says, on this matter: "Human conceit is the most difficult to overcome in connection with this matter, especially educated conceit. From this spring pride and prejudice, imparting such strength to preconception that the doorways of the mind become not only closed but hermetically sealed against the admission of every new truth. A large part of what is called science is only learned speculation. The atomic theory, the nebular hypothesis, the wave theory of light, the origin of species, the law of evolution, are mere speculations. The history of science is in great part the history of the construction and subsequent destruction of learned hypotheses. If any person in the world should hav learned modesty and humility by experience, it is the investigator and student of physical science."

Mr. Herbold modestly and humbly ciphers out Mr. Kiddle's knowledge and scientific attainments and places them equal to zero.

Webster defines science as being "knowledge." A fact, however simple, when based on absolute proof, becomes knowledge, therefore science—a fact Mr. Herbold evidently fails to comprehend. In my judgment, the more a man claims to know, the less credit he should hav for being wise; therefore Mr. Herbold, who claims to know more of other people's experiences and knowledge than they do themselves, should retire to a back seat until he can come forward with at least a little show of modesty.

In the first place, he asks, "Is Materialism bigotry?" [Mr. Herbold is not responsible for this question. It was affixed by us as a caption to his article.—EDITOR. T. S.] Materialism, pure and simple, "with charity for all and malice toward none," is not bigotry. Although a Spiritualist, with whom spirit communication is a demonstrated fact, yet, I can fully indorse that kind of Materialism. But when it declares war to the knife on those who dare to differ with its dogmatic notions, it becomes bigotry. It is not commendable or proper to say, I am right, you are wrong, therefore I will kill you. Let us compare ideas and facts, and, in harmony, learn of each other. With humanity constituted like Mr. Herbold's, with an intolerant hatred and thirst for the blood of his neighbors, it will be long ages before the lion and the lamb will lie down together.

I hav met very few Materialists who are not unreasonably prejudiced against Spiritualism. When they become so uncharitable as to condemn Spiritualism without honest and thorough investigation, they become, according to Webster, bigots. I hope, therefore, Mr. Charles J. Herbold will not be offended hereafter if I speak of him as Mr. Herbold the bigot.

As Spiritualists, we are strictly on the defensive. We dare not take stock in bigotry; it is as insidiously dangerous as that superstition which has cursed the world for ages. In the true sense of the term we are Materialists. We do not claim that spirit is not matter; we say that so far as we know, and no farther, all things are material. Beyond that all is assumption and speculation.

Materialists of the Herbold school are making war on Spiritualism most unjustly. In the first place, they will not investigate Spiritualism fairly, as Spiritualists do; and, in the second place, they charge us with believing a something exists which is not matter and which did not hav its origin in matter. They insist that spirit or soul, as we use the term, means something that is not matter. For myself, I do not know whether this is true or not. I am induced to think it is not; but so long as I cannot demonstrate it, until I hav acquired all knowledge, I shall be careful how I pretend to know the unknowable. I think this is true generally of progressive Spiritualists. I shall presume that their hatred of Spiritualism is because the world is rapidly being converted to it, and therefore, like the church, as an ism, imagine themselves about to be annihilated.

Mr. Herbold, I notice, uses the same electrotype phrases bigots used thirty years ago. Judging from his article, all he would be able to say in answer to the question, What is Spiritualism? would be "Spooks, mesmerism, twaddle, planchette, dark-lantern mediums, raps, table tippings, banjos, tamborines, babblings, hallucinations." Parrots could do as well. The same meaningless phrases are continually flung to the people from the pulpits by the holy priests of God. Priests and so-called Materialists go hand in hand in this war on Spiritualism. The priests declare war because it conflicts with—therefore destroys—their business. So-called Materialists make war on it because it conflicts with their dogmatic notions of materialistic science. A life beyond the grave is as dangerous a heresy to them as was the Copernican system to the church in the days of Galileo. It must not be tolerated for one moment. They would be compelled to make the humiliating confession that they do not yet know it all, that they hav been mistaken, that there is something in the universe that can not be weighed in their materialistic scales, and that they hav been ignorant, stupid champions of error, while we, poor despised Spiritualists, were right after all.

Mr. Herbold proudly boasts that the great Huxley expressed his sentiments when he said Spiritualism was not worthy his attention. That honestly earns for Mr. Herbold the title of bigot. It is beneath the exalted dignity of such great "men of science" as Huxley and Herbold to investigate the phenomena of the soul, of spirit communication, and of a future existence. If, now, Mr. Huxley should declare the moon to be a large cheese, I could readily believe Mr. Herbold would proudly rise and boast, "Them's my sentiments."

Mr. Herbold says when I hav successfully shown that there is "no force without matter, and no matter without force" it will be time enough to bother their heads about disembodied spirits, etc. I do not know that I ever tried to disprove that statement. I am generally a little cautious about controverting "axiomatic truths," especially if they reach beyond my depth, and the unknowable certainly does.

Mr. Babcock says there is no soul or spirit, also that by our imaginations we create spirits; and if we thus create spirits, of course in the same manner we create all spiritual manifestations. Without attempting to define what constitutes the soul, I simply criticise Mr. Babcock for saying what he did not know and could not prove. I ask again for proof. How does he know there is no soul or spirit? And especially would I ask Mr. Babcock to tell us how he knows we create spirits and spiritual manifestations by our imaginations? Has he or any other Materialist ever tried it successfully? and are they, too, guilty of an excessive and unreasonable use of their imaginations? It seems to me such presumptuous knowledge amounts to the most ridiculous nonsense. If that is scientific Materialism I want none of it. I do not wonder Mr. Herbold concludes our company is mutually distasteful to each other. A man who openly declares he has sacrificed his principles for the sake of policy is always distasteful to me. I love to associate only with men whose principles are steadfast.

Mr. Herbold tells us, "with many a flirt and flutter," that he sacrificed his principles, etc., when he joined the League, and that he enlisted for the war. What war does he refer to. He makes war on Spiritualists, Christians, women, etc. He seems to hav several jobs on hand at present. The Liberal League ought to feel highly honored. It is not every man that would make such a sacrifice. Indeed it is to be hoped he is the only man in the land who has thus denied himself. Nevertheless, Mr. Herbold declares that hundreds hav done the same, that they hav sacrificed their principles for the sake of policy. Gentlemen of the League, stand up! Confess and be forgiven. Mr Herbold has turned state's evidence. The cause must indeed be desperate when hundreds of men will sacrifice their principles voluntarily for the sake of it. Elizur Wright, H. L. Green, E. C. Walker, how is this? Hav you done this thing? We are about to organize a League in Lowell, Michigan, and I did think of joining it, but if I must "sacrifice my principles," and if that is the kind of a crowd I shall find, I am ineligible. I cannot sacrifice my principles any more than George Washington could tell a lie.

Mr. Herbold serves notice on me that he will condescend to tolerate a mock union between Spiritualists and Materialists till the final separation of church and state, and then he will make war on us to the knife. We are really obliged to Mr. Herbold for condescending to use and spare us while we may be of use to him. The wonderful sacrifices he is capable of making are really marvelous. I am really glad he does not liv hereabout. He must be a very dangerous and bloodthirsty man. He is liable to break out any moment. I do hope some means may be devised to conciliate him, at least, before he brings that knife to Michigan.

He says, Mr. Babcock served the same notice on me, in his "Little Lecture." Now if I am able to read and understand the English language correctly, he did no such thing. Mr. Babcock stated in his reply to my criticism that he did not refer, in his own mind, to Spiritualists; that his article was aimed wholly at Christians; that he loved Spiritualists for the grand work we are doing in demolishing the orthodox church, and for the cold water we are pouring into hell.

I hav had the pleasure and honor of meeting Mr. Babcock, and feel proud of his friendship and acquaintance. He is a man whom to know is to love and respect. I think he is not the kind of man that will sacrifice his principles, even for the sake of policy. No truer, honester man ever lived, and when he confessed that he had never investigated Spiritualism, and knew nothing about it, I forgave him, and considered the war between us ended, notwithstanding he claimed the right to talk, hav opinions, etc., about Spiritualism. I do not object to inoffensive, or non-combative bigotry. If any one can find any comfort in it, I am perfectly willing, so long as they mind their own business. I do not claim that bigotry entirely spoils a man. So long as they do not flourish knives and get bloodthirsty I do not apprehend anything very serious will happen.

Mr. Herbold tells us Spiritualism and facts are at war with each other. How does he know? Of course, if, as he says, it is beneath his notice, he has never investigated, therefore does not know what the facts are, or what the claims of Spiritualism are. He should hav defined exactly what those "stubborn facts" are that so conflict with Spiritualism, and explain how they disagree. When he says "phantasmagoria of Spiritualism," he not only confesses his ignorance, but also manifests a determination to vilify and misrepresent to the utmost of his ability. But having "sacrificed his principles," and inadvertently confessed it, due allowance will be made by those who know what kind of an animal we are dealing with. It will not be necessary for Mr. Herbold to tell us he has never investigated Spiritualism. We know it already. There are undoubtedly a great many things and people in this world that are beneath his notice—not worthy his exalted attention.

He says Galileo "taught what can be demonstrated," but to speak of Spiritual phenomena as truths is "begging the question."

As Spiritualists, we claim to hav the only demonstrated knowledge of a future existence. If this exalted, sacrificing individual would only come down from his lofty pedestal of conceit, and condescend to look at facts, he, too, might be able to see what others see, and perhaps change his opinions. Who is this man Herbold, that he should pass judgment on the demonstrated knowledge of thousands of the ablest and wisest in the land? Such ridiculous assumption should meet with the contempt it deserves.

He says "Robert Dale Owen was taken in by the Katy King fraud in Philadelphia, with hundreds of others."

Yes, he was taken in, and by the foulest of frauds, too; but it has been conclusively proved that that fraud was a conspiracy on the part of the church to defraud the public and to crush Spiritualism and those mediums. Mr. Owen was a victim to that conspiracy against Spiritualism, and not to the fraudulent practices of those mediums. Now, if Mr. Herbold will be so good as to tell us by what right he passes judgment upon the knowledge of other men, by what right he wrote that mean, libelous sentence, which no gentleman would write or utter—"It won't do to talk of scientific women. A scientific woman is a rara avis, and when caught I should like to see the plumage"—if he will tell us if he has fairly and thoroughly investigated Spiritualism; if he will giv us a standard so that we may know what science is, what is a demonstrated fact, who are men of science, and who not; we shall be prepared to sift and giv him credit for value received; otherwise we shall be compelled to consider him a phenomenal monstrosity of ignorance, bigotry, and conceit. E. A. CHAPMAN.

O SANCTA SIMPLICITAS!

CINCINNATI, O., March 27, 1880.

I do not claim that animals will not liv hereafter. I think they will, and for this reason: Our affections will remain the same after death, and if we love pets here we shall love them hereafter; therefore dogs, horses, birds, statuary, paintings, books, and flowers will of necessity be found in spirit life.—E. A. Chapman.

MR. EDITOR: When I went to college I had a favorite horse, whom I bestrode every morning, and between whom and myself there existed a friendship which nothing but his death did terminate. I cannot say that poor Hector's ghost has been hovering about me since; if it had, it would no doubt hav stuck its nose into my pockets in search for lumps of sugar, with which I used to regale Hector while in the flesh, and I cannot consider the nightmares that hav visited me at odd times as his spirit, for Hector (when in the flesh) was a horse, not a mare. Hence, notwithstanding these failures of my favorite charger's spirit to come forward in al these long years since he exchanged "this 'ere world for that 'ere." I am glad to learn from Mr. E. A. Chapman that when my immortal soul wrenches itself loose from my body, becomes deodorized, or etherealized, or whatever the correct kibosh is, the spirit of Hector will leave his spirit oats and spirit stable in the bright beyond, and neigh his spirit nostrils and lungs ready to welcome me. I believe Bro. Chapman, for I recognize him as an authority on Spiritualism, and one who, from being in constant and direct communication with the denizens of the shining shore, possessed moreover of a sixth sense, is qualified to speak ex cathedra on these matters. And then I love Bro. Chapman for his way of putting things and his method of drawing conclusions. For instance, I dote on plum-pudding. Am I to be deprived of that succulent dish by "death ending all?" Nonsense, for my affections will remain the same after death. Therefore, if I love plum-pudding here, plum-pudding will, of necessity, be found in spirit life. If you substitute pork and beans the result will be the same, according to Mr. E. A. Chapman. Behold me, then, on my spirit horse cantering through the bright heavens, followed by my spirit dog (who is yet in the flesh, but who will follow me, no doubt, he is so intelligent, so attached to me, and I love him so much!) barking spirit barks out of spirit-canine lungs, a favorite volume under my arm, my spirit nose immersed in a spirit nosegay, and the prospect of a spirit plum-pudding for myself and spirit provender for Hector before us. Hoop-la! Is it not a bright and glorious picture? Alas! it is visions like these, and the hope, nay, certainty, held out by Spiritualism to see them realized, that is daily thinning out the ranks of the bigoted and deluded followers of Huxley, Vogt, Haeckel, Tyndall, and other exponents of exact science. It is temptations like these that start the bewildered Materialists off in quest of the blarney stone or that blessed sixth sense of which Mr. Chapman is the discoverer and patentee, and the possession of which evidently enables a man to dispense not only with common sense, but also with the five ordinarily allotted to him by nature, enables him to turn Spiritualist and climb the blue empyrean far above the maddening crowd and haunts of us gross and groveling Materialists.

Brethren, it is no use; we might as well capitulate at once. We hav not got this sixth sense, and you know it. We could not make use of it if we had, owing to our long-continued habit of worrying along with those we hav, and you know that also. And there is not philosophy enough in a million of us to successfully withstand the fascinations of, or to combat, let alone to overthrow, the plum-pudding argument. O sancta simplicitas! CHAS. J. HERBOLD.

OTTAWA, O., March 29, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please find within $10.00. Continue THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880. Send me the "Champions of the Church," and one copy of the "Mohammedan Bible," also send a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to Judge J. J. Moore for six months, and a copy to Lewis Simmonds for six months, the balance to me in "Iron Clad" and "Manna" for distribution.

If our Liberals would spend a little more money and not so much wind, I am morally sure it would benefit our cause greatly. A few dimes spent purchasing those "Leaflets," and judiciously distributing the same, will accomplish more to vindicate Bennett and show up the position of the church than five hundred empty letters of condolence.

Mr. Editor, an outsider, judging from the many letters of condolence found in every issue of your paper, would conclude that the society was made up of pessimists, or we were the plebeians and gutter-snipes of America. Why ever spread before the world our poverty and endeavor to smooth the paths of indolence by prating about our good pretensions—"if, if?" Work is abundant in every walk of life, and few need be in straitened circumstances. It is work we need in the Liberal ranks. Let us hav more work done and less prayers; more energy and less moaning winds. My dear, my dear poverty-whining brother, put in those extra days in some honest and useful labor that you spend on some drygoods box, with a jackknife in hand, waiting for something to turn up, Micawber-like, and you will be able to send a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, if you like, to some one who you think will appreciate it.

E. C. BEARDSLEY.

LOSTINE, OR., March 13, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find $5, which accept as per order. I deeply sympathize with D. M. Bennett, as in imagination I see him pacing to and fro in his gloomy prison cell, or silently delving away at his task in that model Christian workshop. No mild words can adequately express the intensity of my indignation when I reflect that such a foul outrage on personal liberty can be legally committed in this boasted land of freedom. Oh, what a blessed gospel of love and peace and charity that confines a man behind prison bars for exercising the right of free thought and free speech! But it is always darkest just before day. Priestly rule is doomed. The church views with alarm her waning powers and the increasing spread of Infidelity, and is making spasmodic efforts to crush the latter and regain the former. She would cripple Freethought by striking down one of its champions; but let the Liberals of America see to it that these struggles will only hasten her downfall.

Let me say to our noble friend, Bear up, brave martyr. You hav hosts of friends outside, and if vicarious suffering were allowed in your case thousands would willingly giv you a "spell." W. J. DEAN.

CARTHAGE, MO., March 21, 1880.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Another month has passed away, and brings to us another letter from the champion of right. Bro. Bennett's last letter (March 7th), with its dreamy vision, or visionary dream, givs us a foretaste of what is in store for us in the feast of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." As I hav a natural weakness for good things, please put my name down for one copy.

In years to come (perhaps after I hav returned to mother earth), I want my children to say of it: "This was my mother's book. She prized it very highly, not a love for its worth but for the sake of its author, who was a brave, noble man, and wrote it while incarcerated in a Christian prison, after a mock and most unjust trial, for advocating truth, liberty, and Infidelity to superstition."

Let all who can help Bro. Bennett, as well as the cause, by "doing likewise" and leaving one of the first copies to future generations.

There are several books I shall send for during this year.

Heart and hand with you in the good work,

JULIA E. VANAMAN.

P. S.—Please let me add thanks to those who are foremost in the reception of Mr. Bennett. I wish I could be with you; but as I cannot I intend to hav a little jubilee of my own with some of my friends who, like myself, are so situated they cannot be with you on the eventful occasion. I think the Liberals all over the country should hav a special Fourth of July and day of getting together to rejoice that our defender and leader is free. Husband reads my letter and adds to it: "Them's my sentiments," so you see that there are two of us booked for the place where Thomas Paine, Ingersoll, Amelia Colby, Mrs. Slenker, and all other Infidels, are to go. J. E. V.

INFIDELITY AND CHRISTIANITY CONTRASTED.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find five dollars. I will take "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times" on condition that I may exchange it for other books should I desire to do so, as Bro. Bennett offers.

INFIDELITY.

The universe had no beginning.
This grand truth the learn'd defend;
And that mankind "fall" by sinning
Is not true, we may depend.
Man at first was very low,
As geologists do show.
Universe was not created;
From it all formations came;
And the most profound hav stated
It formed all that we can name.
It was not created by Gods whose dwelling is the sky.

Jewish Gods are pure delusion,
Myths of paganistic dale,
And their Bible is confusion,
Full of murder, crime, and hate;
Some things in it very good
If it's truly understood.
But no good in false religion;
This the Christian may dispute;
Holy Ghost, a wind, a pigeon,
We hav "known it by its fruit;"
Always tortures all it can
Every unbelieving man.

Unbelievers hav a better,
Natural, and perfect creed;
'Tis the spirit, not the letter,
Only Infidels do heed.
Shunning pagan Christian schools.
Trusting universal rules.
The grand universe in motion,
On its lessons we depend;
Here, with absolure devotion,
We will cling unto the end;
Here no crucifixions can Ever shock the mind of man.

Here's the fount of every blessing,
Parents, children, husband, wife,
And all else that's worth possessing,
Every good in human life.
Nature's perfect law the thing
Man to future life may bring.
Noble unbelievers labor
To do just exactly right;
Always love and help their neighbor
Find the truth and perfect light.
And do all the good they can
For the happiness of man.

CHRISTIANITY.

Man is wonderful for sinning;
Ate one apple and the core;
Man did this in "the beginning,"
And his happiness was o'er.
Eve and Adam both did fall,
Therefore we hav sinned all.
What can now be done about it?
A God-baby must be born;
Man can cannot be "shaved" without it.
God forsaken and forlorn.
God himself a baby made;
Sin and sorrow both are stayed.

This "God-baby," precious treasure,
"Grew in grace" to be a man;
Love and hate in equal measure,
Christ conceived God's lovely plan.
To restore man's fabled fall
Christ was crucified for all.
So they killed "a man of sorrow"—
Consummated God's own plan;
Here six hundred churches borrow
Thousand creeds and social ban.
From the tomb God soon arose
Triumphant o'er his mundane foes.

Faith that Christ is God caressing,
Priests proclaim this faith is best,
Only treasure worth possessing—
Givs the most ungodly rest.
Holy Christians' perfect plan
It makes Infidels of man.
Faith in faithless gods above us,
Faith, Jew Bible, is God's word,
Faith that gods both hate and love us.
Hate their children? Most absurd,
If gods love like mothers, well,
Will they send one soul to hell?

Faith alone is man's salvation;
Faith in some peculiar creed,
Which to doubt is sure damnation;
Faith itself is all we need.
Faith that gods do all things frame.
Yet are nothing but a name.
Faith supplies the Christian brother
With religion and with gold.
But his unbelieving mother
Left to perish in the cold.
God has died, and all is well,
But her soul must go to hell.

Thus God's plan has failed to answer
What God always did intend;
Proved to be a dreadful cancer
From beginning to the end,
For the toll of every bell
Sends some precious soul to hell.
Perfect scheme of persecution,
Killing God and killing man;
Fire and brimstone evolution
Seems to be the devil's plan.
Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
But the devil gets the most.

Faith prepares a soul for glory,
Doubting sends it down below;
'Tis the same old Christian story
Taught by pagans long ago.
But the time is drawing nigh
Faith in gods of flesh will die.
Bloody Christian creeds are purely
Plagiarisms of the past;
This great truth is proved most surely;
This great truth is gaining fast.
Truth will falsehood supersede;
Truth is what we most do need.

Very respectfully yours, E. N. KINGSLEY.

OREGON, MO., March 28, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Let it never be forgotten by our friends that while D. M. Bennett and other Freethinkers are punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for alleged violation of the U. S. statutes in some trifling matters of little moment, in the most fashionable bookstores of every large town and city of the Union are publicly exposed for sale such hideously obscene works as the "Decameron," and Balzac's "Droll Stories," and other works that no decent man would dare permit to be read by his sons and daughters. Yet no one dreams of molesting those who sell openly such works, because too many of the orthodox are engaged in the business. Here is impartial administration of law for us! HOLT.

LUNENBURGH, MASS., March 28, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: Blessed is the man whom the powers of darkness, death, and hell persecute, and say all manner of evil against for Freethought's and liberty's sake. Painful and weary are the days and nights of martyrdom. Yet it is through these tribulations the world of mankind has reached the relatively high table-land on which the oppressed and the children of the oppressor alike stand to-day in strength and glory. Bigots hav in all ages striven to kill the body, supposing, short-sighted fools as they ever hav been, they should by their brave deeds kill the spirit and aspirations of free-born thought. I hav watched with bated breath, ever since your arrest, the development of the infuriated and infernal conservators of priestcraft and judge-craft, who frame iniquity into law and bigotry into statutes, as illustrated in your case before the courts, supported by a free people in a free country, of laws enacted by a free people, and executed by their servants and at their cost.

I sicken before the appalling fact that I liv in a country where the highest tribunals are prostituted instrumentalities of bigotry, cruelty, and all that train of infamy and injustice that characterized the reign of Jefferies, Laud, and Strafford, inaugurated in the days of terror, when Elliot, Hollis, Baxter, Williams, and a host of others, good men, lovers of freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of action,

"Paid the debt
To unrelenting hate,
Of bishop, priest, and judge."

Under the emblems of the balance and the cross, what enormities hav not been perpetrated upon helpless but honest thinkers and workers for the progress of our kind. What hellish tyrants men become when once clothed with irresponsible power. I regard the judiciary of all lands, and especially of ours, the most dangerous department of power. The charm and strength of the church is fast fading away. All its moral enforcing power has long since died out, even of remembrance. An irresponsible judiciary, appointed not for its fitness, integrity, and honor, but by bribery, nepotism, and political party servitude to which they are appointed, is the most alarming feature of our times, hastening on a state of irritation and unrest that points the finger of alarm.

This indiscreet surrender of the courts to the flattering voice of party politics and sectarian clamor is undermining the reverence of the people and their respect for law faster than the sea reptiles that waste and weaken the staunch ship's ribs in southern seas. Elevated above the elective franchise of the people, playthings of their own prejudices and biases, loves, hates, and grudges, courting the influences and affluences of those who, like themselves, sit in regal pauperment, how strong the temptation to use their privileges for wicked as well as righteous ends; and when judges so made by the ruling oligarchies, religious, political, or combined, are required to settle questions of law, will they be likely to cross their life-long prejudices? Taney was as good as the most of the fur-clad fraternity, yet he, with the declaration of freedom in one hand, readily wrote with the other oppression, slavery, and moral death to a whole race of men because their skin was blacker than his and their status below that of a judge.

Much of the agglomerated evil would disappear if judges were held amenable to the people and held office by their voice. Men ever hav and ever will do better when thrown upon their good behavior than when appointed by some clique who can manage with adroitness to hoodwink the people and proclaim the sacredness of law and official robes of sanctified skins of vermin as the blinders.

I am glad they are so fast running to seed; the more they victimize, and the faster they do it, the sooner they will get to the "turn in the lane," and the sooner they will cease to plague the world, and the people will elect men to execute judgment in the earth, with the fear of truth and love of justice before their eyes.

Desperate means are needful to the cure of desperate ills, and what more desperate means could well be conceived than for Colgate, Comstock, and Britton to start out to evangelize the free-loving, free-thinking, free-speaking people of America:

"Can they conquer? So they deem.
Will they conquer; No, they dream.
What are sheriffs, counts, and lies
In a conflict with the wise?"

As yet these malicious bigots hav the power to fine, imprison, torture, and put to death, as they boast of having done, all innovators, heretics, Sabbath-breakers, profane swearers, Nihilists, Communists, and Radicals; and just at this time all these ancient wrongs, all these old Blue laws of the ages, are being galvanized by "God's anointed," and the struggle is for life or death. Servetus, Bruno, John Rogers went to death, but to this hour I fear their half-fried words issuing through the flame and smoke of blazing green wood and fagots. "You can burn us; we can despise you." Yes, through the bars, through the flames, and through the arches of the tomb we hav power to hurl back in their faces the defiance of unsubdued men. This is the martyr's glory and sovereign force that at last "conducts the world to freedom."

The time of your captivity is fast nearing the terminal period, and one feels induced to ask, How far has the cause of chastity and cleanliness and godliness been served?

This letter has lain on my table three months, awaiting a chance to drop it into your hands between so many stronger letters of sympathy and respect. Accept it as my poor sheaf of sticks and leaves. A. H. WOODS.

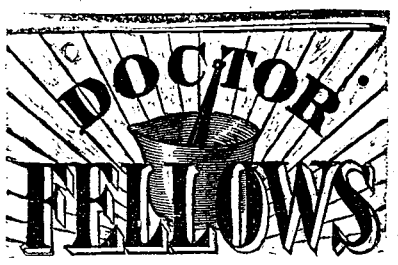
FRANKTON, IND., Feb. 22, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav often felt that I ought to write you a few lines, but when I see so many letters from much abler writers I feel that a letter of my kind could not be of much interest to you. I read your "Seventh Letter from Albany" with much interest. I am so glad to hear that your health is good again, and that you are bearing up under your load of grief, not sin, as well as you are. I can only say that you hav no friend that has more sympathy for you than myself. I am glad that you are going ahead with your book. I want the first volume that is bound. I want it for a keepsake, to lay up as a memento. I wish it would hav a family record in it. Think I will be able to sell several books. Hoping that you will soon be at liberty again, I am,



Yours truly, L. R. WEBB.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNCLER

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS

is a highly educated and scientific physician. He has an original system of practice, and is perfectly reliable and trustworthy. We hav heard many flattering reports of his successful cures of diseases incident to humanity."

THE POCASSET TRAGEDY THE LEGITIMATE FRUITS OF CHRISTIANITY.

A Discourse by

WILLIAM DENTON.

This is the masterly lecture reprinted in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the best on the subject, and shows in the clearest manner that that sad tragedy was but the to-be-looked-for outcome of the teaching of the Bible.

Issues of the Age.

CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED IN MODERN THOUGHT.

BY HENRY C. PEDDER.

Extra cloth, beveled, black and gold back and side stamps, 12mo, 185 pp., price, $1.00.

Everything that we now deem of antiquity was at one time new; and what we now defend by examples will at a future period stand as precedents.—Tacitus.

An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.

He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces a thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $1.75.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

AUTHORITIES.—On Egypt, Wilkinson, Rawlinson's Herodotus, Bunsen; Ethiopia or Abyssinia, Bruce, Baker, Lepsius; Carthage, Heeren's African Nations, Niebuhr, Mommsen; East Africa, Vincent's Periplus, Gulliain, Hakluyt Society's Publications; Moslem Africa (Central), Park, Caille, Denham and Clapperton, Lander, Barth, Ibn Batuta, Leo Africanus; Guinea and South Africa, Azurara, Barros, Major, Hakluyt Purchas, Livingstone.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill."—Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—Penn Monthly.

We could scarcely hav supposed it possible for any writer, however gifted, to put into one volume, reasonable in size and price, so much reliable information, sound logic, and inspiring thought.—Literary Review.

READ THIS LIST OF STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT, 141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Right of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 25 cents.

Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations. Forms for Organizing Societies, Forms for Constitutions and By-Laws, for Funeral Services, Marriage Services, Naming of Infants, Obituary Notices, Epitaphs, Wills, etc. Also, nearly 525 Liberal and Spiritualistic Hymns, original and selected, for Public Meetings, Funerals, Social Gatherings, etc. The whole supplemented by a fine selection of Recitations, comprising many of the finest poetical gems in the language. Over 580 pages, at the extremely low price of 75 cents, in cloth.

Chronicles of Simon Christianus. His Manifold and Wonderful Adventures in the Land of Cosmos. A New Scripture from an antique manuscript (evidently inspired) discovered by I. N. FIDEL, in conjunction with A. HOOK, Esq. Very amusing. Price, 25 cents.

Proceedings and Addresses at the Freethinkers' Convention, held at Watkins, N. Y., August 22, 23, 24, and 25, 1878. A volume of 400 pages, containing the speeches made during the four days' session by Dr. T. L. Brown, Prof. A. L. Rawson, Elder F. W. Evans, Elder G. A. Lomas, Prof. J. H. W. Toohey, Dr. J. M. Peebles, Dr. T. B. Taylor, Hon. George W. Julian, James Parton, T. B. Wakeman, Elizur Wright, T. C. Leland, C. D. B. Mills. Mrs. L. N. Colman, Mrs. P. R. Lawrence, Ella E. Gibson, Mrs. Mary E. Tillotson, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol, W. E. Copeland, Horace Seaver, John W. Truesdell, and several other persons. Price, cloth, $1.25.

Truth Seeker Tracts. Bound Volumes I., II., III., IV., and V. These volumes, containing over 520 pages each, are made up of over one hundred Truth Seeker Tracts, with some additional kinds. They embrace a variety of subjects by different authors, written in a terse, trenchant, and spicy style. They are offered at the extremely low price of 60 cents per volume in paper covers, and $1.00 in cloth; or 50 cents each in paper, and 75 cents each in cloth if the whole set is taken.

Sepher Toldoth Jeschu; or, the Book of the Generation of Jesus. First English translation of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about the year 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam (Mary) by Joseph Pandera. How and why the Romans changed "Kepha" to "Petros." Startling evidence that Paul flourished before the middle of the first century B. C., contemporary with the aforesaid Kepha. Price, 20 cents.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier, curate of a Romish church in France in the eighteenth century, whose views upon theology were not published until after his death, and are now for the first time presented in English. Very radical and able. Price, 25 cents.

Influence of Christianity Upon Civilization. By B. F. UNDERWOOD. Revised edition. One of the most able treatises upon the subject ever written. Price, 25 cents.

Christianity and Materialism. By B. F. UNDERWOOD. Revised edition. In this treatise the two systems are fairly and ably examined from a historical standpoint. Price, 15 cents.

What Liberalism Offers in the Place of Christianity. By B. F. UNDERWOOD. Price, paper, 10 cents.

Amberley's Life of Jesus; His Character and Doctrine. A chapter from "The Analysis of Religious Belief." By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY. Price, cloth, 60 cents; paper, 35 cents.

Resurrection of Jesus. By W. S. BELL. Revised and enlarged edition. Price, 25 cents.

Religion not History. An able examination of the morals and theology of the teachings of the New Testament. By W. F. NEWMAN, Emeritus Professor of University College, London. From the London edition. Price, 25 cents.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker," and CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED, of Moravia, N. Y. Proposition discussed: "Jesus Christ is not only divine, but is the Lord God, creator of heaven and earth." Teed affirming: Bennett denying. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Blakeman's Two Hundred Poetical Riddles. (For children and youth.) Embracing a great variety of subjects. This work is new and interesting, and affords a great amount of amusement in the family circle, as well as in gatherings of children and older people. Price, 20 cents.

Six Lectures on Astronomy. By PROF. RICHARD A. PROCTOR. Delivered at Steinway Hall, New York, in the winter of 1875-76. 1. Growth of Worlds; 2. Life and Death of Worlds; 3. Other Worlds than Ours; 4. Other Suns than Ours; 5. The Great Mysteries of the Universe; 6. Religion and Astronomy. 65 pp. Paper, 20 cents

Beyond the Veil. A Spiritualistic work, said to be dictated by the spirit of PASCHAL BEVERLY RANDOLPH, aided by Emmanuel Swedenborg and others, through the mediumship of Mrs. Frances H. McDougall and Mrs. Luna Hutchinson. It gives minute and interesting descriptions of life in the spirit world—its location, intermediate state, landscape, habitation, food, clothing, industrial interests, etc. It contains a steel engraving of P. B. Randolph. A neat volume. Price, $1.50.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

JUST OUT!

Another Extraordinary Book!

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth: price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers by permission to JOS. S. FISHER, President; W. I. P. INGRAHAM, vice-President; W. PAINE, M.D.; O. S. GAUNTT, M.D.; H. J. DOUCET, M.D.; R. H. KLINE, M.D.; J. R. HOLCOMB, M.D.; N. R. LYNCH, M.D.; and M. R. O'CONNELL, M.D., faculty of the Philadelphia University of Medicine and Surgery; also the faculty of the American University of Philadelphia; also Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Association.

Address Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

AND AN

Examination of their Doctrines.

BY KERSEY GRAVES,

Author of "The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors," and "Biography of Satan."

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Revelations of Antichrist

CONCERNING

Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

The book contains 446 pages, with a very full Index and table of contents. Price, $200.

The Scientific Aspect of Prayer, etc., etc.

VOLUNTARY OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

A lecture replete with eloquence.—San Francisco Chronicle.

She is a powerful advocate of the cause she has espoused.—San Jose Mercury.

Mrs. Lake is the best lady lecturer that has ever appeared before a Portland audience.—Portland Oregonian.

As a speaker she is vastly superior to any woman we hav ever heard; for beauty of diction, depth of thought, and grace in delivery she is remarkable.—Salem (Or.) Record.

She has the power of entrancing her audience, and, by her eloquence, commanding the respect of those most opposed to her.—Corvallis Gazette.

Mrs. Lake is one of the finest orators we hav ever listened to. Can hardly be excelled by any speaker on this coast, either man or woman.—Yreka Journal.

Her eloquence and masterly style giv evidence of a highly cultivated mind as well as a complete comprehension of her subject.—Eureka (Nev.) Sentinel.

Whatever cause she espouses has in her an advocate of more power and brilliancy than is usually found on the rostrum, and her influence will be felt wherever she goes.—Council Bluffs Nonpareil.

Pleasant appearance, graceful carriage, a good elocutionist, eloquent, using well-chosen language to express her ideas.—Clinton Herald.

Mrs. Lake is a brilliant speaker, finely cultured, a trained elocutionist, and a powerful advocate of truth, reason, and constitutional liberty.—Le Claire Pilot.

She may be addressed, Clinton, Iowa.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

Tyndall's Belfast Inaugural Address

and the famous articles of

Prof. Tyndall and Sir Henry Thompson

ON PRAYER.

With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of Prof. Tyndall. And opinions of his services by the eminent scientist, Prof.

H. HELMHOLTZ.

Paper, 12mo, 105pp., 25 cts.; cloth, heavy tinted paper, 50 cts. Inaugural and portrait only, 12mo, paper, 69pp., 10 cts.

Prof. Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world. —N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in the world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our age.—N. Y. Tribune.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

BY L. FEUERBACH,

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc.

Translated from the German.

Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

A Few Words About the Devil,

And Other Biographical Sketches and Essays.

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second edition, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1.25.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him. —The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

The Rights of Man. By THOMAS PAINE. Written in defense of his fellowman. A work almost without a peer in the world. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

Life of Thomas Paine. By CALVIN BLANCHARD. 12mo. Large type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 2 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

Notes and Clippings.

LOOK at this picture: Col. Ingersoll made $40,000 last year preaching the gospel of no red-hot hereafter, and our Methodist minister made less than $400 by holding up the other end of the beam.—Pipestone Star.

SPEAK little, but speak the truth; spend little, but pay cash. Little and often makes a heap in a time. It is better to go supperless to bed than run in debt, unless you are a popular preacher, and then you can pass the hat around and pay off your church debt, if not your own.

WE are informed by good authority that the Center schoolhouse has been closed against all Liberal meetings whilst left open to all others! Who says that the spirit of intolerance does not prevail in our land? We are also informed that the same thing has been done with the court-house at Republic county.—Cloud County Blade.

TAXPAYERS had to pay six hundred and fifty dollars for prayers for our wise Solons while they were discussing laws and squandering the people's money. This was at the rate of about twelve dollars apiece for prayers. If Rev. Tool, our representative from Jasper, had been a genuine reformer, he might hav done this praying himself and saved the burden to the taxpayers.—Iowa National.

THE Milwaukee Sentinel says the books of Col. Ingersoll hav been excluded from the trains of the Chicago and Northwestern railroad by an order issued from headquarters. The managers of the Chicago and Northwestern had better giv their undivided attention to business affairs and allow people who travel over their road to select their own literature. Literary censorship by a railroad is rather a new departure.—Commonwealth.

A FOUR-YEAR-OLD Sunday-school girl did the best she could with a question that was asked of the infant class. Said the teacher, reading from Isaiah xxxvii., 1: "'And it came to pass when King Hezekiah heard it that he rent his clothes.' Now, what does that mean, children—he rent his clothes?" Up went a little hand. "Well, if you know, tell us." "Please, ma'am," said the child, timidly, "I s'pose he hired 'em out."

AT a religious meeting in Winsted, Conn., on a recent Sunday, the wife of a well-known citizen told how much religion had done for her and how much better she was with it than without it. When she had spoken another sister got up and expressed a fervent hope that if religion had done for the preceding speaker all that she had said she would soon become good enough to pay her the fifty cents she owed her. Religion that does not make its professors honest has not taken hold of them at the right end.

THE committee in charge of the ovation to be given to D. M. Bennett upon his release from the Albany Penitentiary hav secured Chickering Hall for Sunday evening, May 2d. A number of the Spiritualists and Liberals of Philadelphia hav announced their intention to go to this reception. Let there be a large turnout from all parts of the country to make this demonstration one of the largest and most earnest protests against the encroachments of bigotry ever held in this country.—Mind and Matter.

THAT was an interesting riot which a body of Reformed Presbyterians got up the other day in Pittsburgh, Pa., over the settlement of the Rev. Nevin Woodside, late of Brooklyn, N. Y. The better to prepare themselves they opened the fight with prayer and then proceeded in regular disorder to break chairs and tables over each other's heads, to blacken one another's eyes and to do many other things which are deemed unbecoming as well as unnecessary in a religious gathering. The Mayor and police finally drove the militant Christians out on the sidewalk. If those fellows are reformed what sort of Presbyterians must the unreformed be?

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, visiting the family of a noted clergyman in Washington, innocently remarked to one of the ladies that he had heard Colonel Ingersoll lecture on the "Mistakes of Moses." The clergyman, overhearing the remark, became excited, and demanded to know whether it was really true his guest had been to hear Bob Ingersoll lecture. Upon receiving an affirmative reply, he opened the door and told the young man to be gone, and never again cross his threshold. "No man," said he, "can enter my portals who attends Bob Ingersoll's lectures!" Colonel Bob can now retaliate by expelling from his law-office all clients who attend preaching by the clergy.

AT Evansville, Indiana, April 18th, the Rev. George Chainey startled his congregation by incorporating in his resignation the statement that he was not a Christian, and that, as Unity church declared itself Christian, he felt impelled to place his resignation in its hands. The condition on which he would remain, if it was not accepted, was that he should not be expected to pray or pronounce a benediction. He recommended the sale of the hymn-books for waste paper. The letter of resignation covers nine pages of legal cap paper, and is full of strong language. The sermon which preceded is quite as remarkable as the resignation. It renounces all supernaturalism, and declares the worship of God, as it is usually conducted, as much idolatry as bowing down to a stick or stone. The announcement that he was to resign had filled the church, and the manner and matter of the resignation produced a decided sensation and a great division of sentiment among the members.

FORT WAYNE, Ind., is at last reveling in the luxury of a clerical scandal, which promises to dismember a congregation in that city, and disrupt one or two heretofore happy families. The Third-Street Methodist Episcopal church is the one affected. Last Sabbath was the time chosen to throw the bombshell into the ranks of its congregation. The pastor, Rev. J. M Woolpert, was absent from the city. At the evening services one of the brethren, one William Jackson, mounted the pulpit and stated that he had some matters of importance to communicate to the church. Jackson is an exhorter and class-leader. He read his charges, and asserted that the pastor had been guilty of criminal intimacy with several of the sisters, calling them by name. He also charged the trustees with misappropriating the funds of the church, especially naming Robert Shaffer, one of the trustees. This action by Jackson caused intense excitement, and he was frequently interrupted, but he kept on reading until he finished his manuscript.

AS MAINE was the first state to enact a prohibitory liquor law, so now it is the first to enact more stringent laws than any previous legislation upon the subject. Although it has been demonstrated over and over again during the last twenty years or more, it has been in force in the state of Maine that prohibition does not prohibit, there are enough fanatics still alive there to control legislation and go on enacting laws which cannot possibly tend to promote temperance or even common honesty. One section of the new statute forbids the sale of cider to be used as a beverage. Another provides for the remission of fines, imposed for intoxication, on condition that the tippler will tell where he gets his toddy. Between a drunkard and an informer, most persons prefer the former on the score of respectability. All laws that tend to break down honor are bad. The Anthony Comstocks, whether in Maine, New York, or Iowa, in postal affairs, or the liquor trade, are despicable sneaks. Laws that offer a premium for the production of such creatures are not in the interest of public morals or decency.

BETWEEN the years 1876 and 1879 Catherine Burke, now about thirty-five years old, was housekeeper for Rev. F. Van Der Bom, pastor of St. Mary's church, East Saginaw, Michigan. In 1879 she was discharged for having been charged with stealing from a butcher shop. Three weeks ago she stated to Rev. Father Sweeney, pastor of St. Joseph's church, that Father Van Der Bom had ruined her, and had on two occasions committed adultery with the wife of a well-known citizen, whose name is at the present withheld. She told the story to another priest, and offered to settle with Van Der Bom for $2,000. Father Van Der Bom denied her assertions and refused any compromise. She then went before a notary public and had her accusations put into the shape of an affidavit and swore to their truth. The matter was referred to Bishop Borgess, who told Father Van Der Bom to resort to the civil courts if he was innocent. The woman was arrested on a charge of maliciously and wilfully circulating reports derogatory to the good name of Father Van Der Bom. She furnished bail in the sum of $1,500 to appear for examination.

CERTAIN editions of the Bible, owing to the errors they contained, hav received many odd names. What is known as the "Breeches Bible" (Geneva 1560) was so called because Genesis ii, 7, was translated: "They sewed fig-leaves together and made themselves breeches," instead of "aprons," as in the English version now used. In the "Treacle Bible" (1568), Jeremiah viii, 22 was made to read: "Is there no 'treacle' in Gilead," etc., instead of "balm," and in 1609 the word was changed to 'resin.' "Balm" was first used in 1611. The "Vinegar Bible," printed in Oxford in 1717 by John Basket, derives its name from the heading of Luke xx, which was made to read: "The parable of the vinegar." The book had many other errors, from which it has also been called, after the printer's name, "A Basket of Errors." In 1631 a Bible was printed in England, and in 1732 another appeared in Germany, both of which made the seventh commandment read, "Thou shalt commit adultery, the word "not" being omitted. It has been very appropriately called the "Wicked Bible."

SAYS the Worthington (Iowa) Advance: A clergyman from an adjoining county writes and says: "I preached in this town yesterday and saw here for the first time a copy of your paper. I like its motto very much indeed, and I particularly like the practical application of the motto which is made in the 'Free Opinion' column. I think you are in error in your opinion about Bennett, and I feel sure you are about Comstock." Here is a minister very much after our own heart—a man who believes in "free thought, free speech, and a free press." But we are very sure we are not in error about Bennett and Comstock. We are just as sure that Bennett is a martyr for free thought and free speech as ever any man was in the darkest ages of Europe. And we are just as sure that Comstock is as infamous a persecutor of men, and as much an enemy to human freedom, as the worst devotee of priestcraft and kingcraft ever was. A man whose conscience is so warped that he can think he is doing right when he hires men and women to commit crime and then has them arrested and punished for it, is either a poor monomaniac or a tricky villain. A man who can boast that he has driven fifteen fellow-mortals to suicide is fit only to be spit upon by Christian people.

IN the quaint old city of Nuremberg, Germany, the traveler must not fail to visit the dungeons under the city walls, filled with instruments of torture. They were used for the purpose of paternally correcting the heresies of the olden time. If a man did not think on religious subjects as everybody else chose to think the authorities were so solicitous about his soul's welfare, and so careful lest he should carry the contagion of his Freethinking into his neighbor's house, that they promptly arrested him and tried to work the heresy out of his mind by the genial but allopathic remedy of the thumbscrew. No one knows the real strength of his convictions until this test has been applied. At the first twist the victim declares that he will believe just what he pleases, and defies the church to change his opinions. At the second twist, when the bit of iron presses on his thumbnails like the grip of a cold-hearted giant, the bare possibility of a change of opinion for the first time occurs to him, and he is willing to admit that the arguments to which he has listened are not exactly as strong as they might be. At the third twist he is perfectly sure that he would like to look the subject over again, and when he comes to the fourth twist he generally sees the error of his ways and confesses that he was totally and absolutely wrong in every one of his conclusions, while the fifth twist puts him into such a placid and docile frame of mind that he is quite willing to subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles, or, indeed, to three hundred and thirty-nine if the patriarchal church will only giv him a chance to use his hands once more. We hav nothing of that kind nowadays, and neither the Catholic nor Protestant church resorts to measures of cold iron to keep its constituency facing in the right direction, and yet the great lesson of charity has not been learned by heart. We are still governed by "isms" or "oxies," and there are denominational thumbscrews which hurt almost as much as the coarser ones of the thirteenth century.

Events of the Week.

THE wife of President Diaz of Mexico is dead.

LORD LYTTON has resigned the viceroyship of India.

THE king of Siam and suite are about to visit Europe.

A NEGRO murderer was lynched at Greensburgh, La., on the 12th.

POISON was recently discovered in a dish of food on the Czar's dining-table.

ON the 14th San Francisco experienced the severest shock of earthquake felt for years.

A LARGE number of Russian convicts hav escaped from the penal island of Saghalien.

THERE are at present twenty thousand exiles on the way from Russia to the Siberian mines.

FIFTY of the sixty-four scholars in a New Jersey school hav had the measles within a month.

IN consequence of the famine in Hungary five thousand Hungarians hav left that country for America.

A SUIT for $900 000 was recently decided against Jay Gould at Washington by the Supreme Court.

IT is rumored that about one hundred Spanish soldiers and officers were recently massacred by Cuban insurgents.

THE ex-Empress Eugenie has arrived at Cape Town, South Africa, on her way to the scene of her son's death in Zululand.

GRANT, with his retinue, appears to be electioneering in the West. A third term is confidently predicted for him by his friends.

DISRAELI has tendered his resignation to the Queen. It is expected that Gladstone will succeed him as prime minister of England.

A DANGEROUS incendiary has been discovered in Plainfield, N. J., in the person of an eleven-year-old boy. Many recent fires hav been traced to him.

THE forest fires in New Jersey and Pennsylvania hav been extinguished, but extensive ones are still raging in Virginia, and residents are fleeing for their lives.

A LAND-SLIDE in Visalia, Cal., on the 17th, crushed a boarding-house at the Empire mine. It is reported that fifteen men are missing and that at least four are known to be killed.

CONSIDERABLE excitement prevails in Georgia over the rich discoveries of gold in Nacoochee Valley. Large nuggets hav been taken out, and the yield grows richer as the mining proceeds.

THE Cohoes strikers are still out, and the mill owners are filling their places with Canadians. The employers threaten to eject the strikers from their cottages if they do not come to terms.

A TERRIBLE hurricane swept through the Missouri Valley on the 18th. Marshfield, Mo., was totally destroyed by storm and fire, and more than 100 persons killed. Many other towns were badly damaged.

A MIRACLE worker has turned up in Scott county, Virginia. He is said to cure paralysis, rheumatism, and cancer, by merely touching the afflicted person; and he does not claim to be the son of God either.

CALLAO, the principal Peruvian seaport, has been blockaded by six Chilian war steamers. A panic has arisen in Lima, the capital, which is only nine miles from Callao, and the inhabitants are fleeing to the interior. The Peruvian army has been defeated on the southern coast.

SEVEN hundred men, women, boys, girls, priests, and foreigners were buried alive under the towers of the city walls of Rangoon, Burmah, as a sacrifice for the restoration of the king's health. He was suffering from leprosy. The Burmese believe in vicarious atonement. The king has since died.

SOME powder in the Giant Powder works at Berkeley, Cal., exploded on the 16th, killing twelve white men and fifteen Chinamen. This is the third explosion at these works, all attended with loss of life. There were six thousand pounds of powder in the buildings. All the victims were blown to atoms.

An Exposition of Liberalism.

DELIVERED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE PITTSBURGH LIBERAL LEAGUE, NOVEMBER 16, 1879.

BY HON. A. B. BRADFORD.

The Spiritualists, Materialists, and Theistic Rationalists, who, I take it, mainly compose such meetings as this, are not at present very popular with their countrymen. By those who do not as yet understand us, as they will after a while, we are reproachfully called "Radicals." Now a Radical is one who, in regard to all subjects of investigation, especially in religion, morals, and politics, is not satisfied with mere surface appearances, but goes down to the roots and grounds of things. The trunk and branches of a tree depend upon its roots which are anchored in the earth and through which it derives its life. If the tree be a bad one, of strong growth, you cannot destroy it by cutting away the outer branches, but you must extirpate it; that is, take it out by the roots. You see the comparative abortiveness of all the efforts we hav made, and are still making, to destroy the vice of drunkenness. It is because we hav expended our time and strength in cutting off the twigs and small branches in one part of the overshadowing upas tree, while the roots are sending out a growth in other parts of it greater than the destruction we make. The Radical, after much observation and thought, thinks, with Victor Hugo, the French patriot and philosopher, that if you want to reform either a drunkard or any other devotee of vice, you must begin with his grandmother. He thinks of course that all discussion of important subjects, and all questions of reform, in order to be of permanent benefit, must not be superficial, but radical.

Then we are denounced by the church people as "skeptics," although we are obedient to the injunction of Paul, "Prove all things and hold fast to that which is good;" and although we follow the teaching of Christ, who said, "Yea, and why even of your own selves judge ye not what is right?" The whole of the modern triumph of knowledge over ignorance, and science over mere speculation, is due to the fact that some men would not take for granted the truthfulness of the teaching of past ages, but first doubted, then examined, and finally found out that the ancients were wrong. The word "skeptic" is of Greek etymology, and means, not a man who rejects a proposition because it is old and has been universally received, but who examines to see if it be false or true. The church, many centuries ago, took the ground that her teachings, embodied in her creeds, were a finality; that the docket for taking evidence was closed; that the canon of scripture was complete, leaving nothing more to be desired, because heaven had no further revelation to make; and that now all men were bound to accept her word implicitly in regard to all questions in religion. But in process of time one man after another, impelled by a love of truth, rose up and said, "Skeptomai"—I examine, I inquire; and the church, angered at their impudence, denounced them as "skeptics." When Copernicus doubted whether the earth was flat, and the sun revolved around it, the church sent the skeptic to prison; and when Bruno doubted in like manner, they burnt him at the stake. The church, claiming to be the infallible spokesman of the Bible and the Almighty, repudiates with scorn and revenge the spirit of inquiry, and hence, while the term skeptic is one of real honor, she has made it a term of reproach. When Arius, in the fourth century, doubted the doctrine of the Athanasian creed that Jesus was the eternal son of God, alleging that a child could not be as old as its father, neither could he beget his own father, as the doctrine of the Trinity requires us to believe, he was stigmatized as a skeptic because he proposed to examine the scriptures to see if these things were so.

It is said from every pulpit in Christendom that modern skepticism is only a resurrection of the Infidelity of past ages, and that its objections hav been met and answered over and over again. But there never was a greater mistake, or rather a stronger proof of sheer ignorance. I say ignorance, for the sectarian clergy who say so are mere ecclesiastical boxers. They know how to attack each other's creeds, and how to defend their own; but as to religion, as a grand department in the science of authropology, they are, for obvious reasons, the most ignorant class of men in society, and always hav been. Like an old worn-out wagon, their minds run in deep church ruts, from which you cannot extricate them without breaking the wheels and wrecking the whole locomotive machine. The truth is that the present arguments against the popular religion are the natural inferences made from the amazing results of the scientific investigation that has taken place in this generation. The weapons now used with such deadly effect against the church and her creeds are such as Paine, Voltaire, and the other skeptics of the eighteenth century, never dreamed of, because they knew nothing of modern science and had no idea of the revelations it was soon to make to the world. Science has its field of inquiry in the realm of the knowable, and demonstrates all its propositions. The watchword which has heralded all its triumphs is doubt—skepticism, a determination to take nothing for granted or on mere authority, but to prove all things by the unerring standard of fact and reason. And it is a remarkable circumstance, which I ought to mention before closing this paragraph, that the scientific men, to whom we are indebted for our present attainments in knowledge, never pursued their investigations with the design of exploding the pretensions of the church as a teacher of true religion; but, stimulated by the love of truth alone, they made their wonderful discoveries, and it was only when all was over, and their announcements made, that they noticed the bearing of them upon the questions growing out of religion. In establishing the truth of the correlation and conservation of forces, and the consequent unbroken reign of natural law, it was an afterthought altogether that it cut up by the roots the whole doctrine of miracles, which is the corner-stone of the church, and stamped as absurd the idea that in the plan of the universe there were blunders which required the architect to stop the machinery and make the necessary repairs.

We are called "Infidels" also; that is, unbelievers. But unbelievers in what? This is another ecclesiastical term, and means one who rejects the popular religion. He is an Infidel—"giaour"—in Turkey who disbelieves in Mohammed as the Prophet of God and in the Koran as an inspired book. He is an Infidel in Pennsylvania who rejects the doctrine of the divinity of Christ and the plenary and infallible inspiration of the sixty-six books composing our Protestant Bible. I venture to say that the so-called Infidels of this country, instead of having no real faith, are the most sincere believers we hav. True, they hav no metaphysical dogmas in their creed, and would neither burn nor imprison one who disagrees with them, but there are propositions which they sincerely believe and are willing to suffer for if need be. The Infidel, called by the Latins Deist, and by the Greeks Theist, believes in a God, but not the God of the churches. When he stands before the universe—consisting of myriads of suns, with their systems of worlds, all in motion like our own—he is transfixed with awe and adoration at the mighty and intelligent force or power that upholds all and guides all on an unerring plan. If such profound feeling is of the essence of true worship, how much more sincere and worshipful is he who reverentially bows before the great Unknowable, smiting upon his breast under a sense of his own comparative nothingness, than the ignorant, and therefore presumptuous, pulpiteer who addresses the Deity as if he were an impressible old boon-companion living round the corner, and who, in his prayers, advises and insists that God shall repeal the laws of nature and work miracles so as to carry out the schemes of his poor sectarian brain! I say again, and challenge proof to the contrary, that the most really pious man in society is the Infidel, who has too much respect for the wisdom of God to believe in the doctrine of miracles, too much reverence to obtrude his advice as to the divine management of the world's affairs, and who religiously obeys the laws of nature because such obedience is better for him and for the welfare of the whole human family. In comparison with his intelligent and devotional spirit, the worship of Christendom is as blind and stupid as the fetich-worship of Africa.

Another term, which, when applied to us is meant to be reproachful, is that of Freethinker. But on a moment's reflection it will be found to be the grandest appellation that could be given to a true man. The human intellect, when properly developed, has the power to travel over the whole field of inquiry, and take in knowledge from every source. It is this which makes man godlike. This is an intimation, at least, of our immortality; for, as the mind is adapted to take in all knowledge, and desires to do so, and as this life is so short that we can acquire but little, it seems a fair inference from the facts that when death interrupts our studies they will be resumed afterward, and indefinitely, when the environments will be more favorable. Philosophy, or man's place in, and relations to, the universe; his duties to his fellows, and to himself as a person; his origin, his present character, and his destiny; these are all deeply interesting subjects of research, and the more we know of them the wiser, the better, and the happier we become.

Now, a person who investigates such themes for himself is a Freethinker—that is to say, he is not an enslaved thinker. Oh, what a tale of shame and outrage this word tells of the church! On the mere assumption that she has the authority of Almighty God to do so, she has always made creeds for the people, and has enforced them upon their belief by pains and penalties. If any man respected himself enough to think in any other way than the one she prescribed, he was denounced as a Freethinker who had broken away from the restraints of the church, and would necessarily first question and then ultimately deny her right of jurisdiction over his soul and conscience. This clearly implies a consciousness on the part of the church that her claims cannot stand the test of investigation. If her creed were the result of inquiry instead of mere authority, she would welcome, instead of opposing, a free discussion of her claims as an infallible teacher.

All people who liv under monarchies are called "subjects." The term is Latin, from sub jaceo, to cast down on the ground and tread upon. To the credit of human nature, the word shows that even in those days of medieval darkness, when the king and the priest, by an unholy copartnership, trampled humanity in the dust, the people had a sense of their rights, and rebelled, and had to be put down. When, therefore, the king vanquished the rebel, he became a "subject," and when the priest vanquished the Freethinker he became "reconciled," and obedient to the church. I hope you will agree with me when I say that he is the best specimen of mankind who allows no authority in the universe to lay the weight of a straw upon the free exercise of his intellectual powers, and who will accept no proposition as true, whether from man, from angel, or from God himself, unless the proof is submitted to his reason and conscience. He who does this is a Freethinker and a free man, and all others are more or less slaves. Then, instead of being angered, let us glory in being called Freethinkers. And let us pity those poor enslaved souls, who, still frightened by the bugbears of the dark ages, crouch before the priesthood, and allow them to put shackles on their intellects and prescribe to them what they are to believe and what they are to do.

There are other epithets of obloquy which are heaped upon us on account of what we deem the very excellence of our characters as thinkers and moralists, but they are too comtemptible to notice. We must not be frightened at terms of reproach. There never was a movement made for the improvement of mankind that was not at first opposed; there never was a new truth offered to the world that was not at first rejected, and those who proposed it loaded it with abuse and ridicule. To-day we are waging war against the puerile, groveling superstitions of the present and past ages, and are laboring to make the human family good, intelligent, and happy. But we are misunderstood and misrepresented by the very people we would redeem. We are not discouraged, however. It is our business to sow the seed of truth in our day and generation. It is time's business to make it grow and bear fruit in the future. In behalf of ourselves and our posterity we are constructing bulwarks around the national Constitution to defend it against the encroachments which Catholic and Protestant churchmen are organizing against it. Would to God that I could impress my fellow-citizens with the conviction that the church, putting forth to-day all the claims she ever made—"semper eadem"—is a constant menace to the liberties of the people. Our Constitution is not as safe a guarantee for human rights as the British Constitution, for, although the British Constitution is an unwritten document, it contains guarantees which the omnipotence of Parliament cannot touch. But our Constitution and laws can be changed by a majority of the people. It is a fearful thought that every man holds his liberties at the will of the majority; therefore it is that we appoint popular meetings like this, and send out productions of the press to keep people enlightened upon the great issues before them. The grand topic which is now up for discussion is the proper relation between the church and the state. Upon this subject the Radicals hav clear and definite views, which I now beg leave to submit to this audience. And we demand:

I. That all church property should be taxed.

The grand principle in the light of which we must discuss this, and the other propositions I intend to make, is found in Article VI, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, where it is declared that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all the treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

Now, if you wish to know what relation the Constitution and government of the United States sustains to the church, or to the subject of religion, in any of its forms and kinds, you hav only to look at the treaty ratified with Tripoli, one of the Barbary powers, which, in religion, was Mohammedan. The President of the United States at that time was George Washington, who had previously acted as presiding officer of the convention which sat in Philadelphia to frame the Constitution of the national government, under which it began its career in 1789. The treaty with Tripoli, after being fully examined and approved by the Cabinet, was sent to the Senate, and, having been discussed by that body in all its parts, was then ratified, and became a part of the supreme law of the land. As the government of Tripoli was Mohammedan, it was naturally jealous and watchful in its treaty stipulations with a power which was not Mohammedan, lest in their commercial intercourse difficulty would grow out of the subject of religion. To remove all apprehensions of this kind, the declaration is solemnly made, in the eleventh article of the treaty, by the United States, as one of the high contracting powers, that "the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion."

Now, if it be concluded by the foreigners who hav come to this country to Europeanize our Constitution and laws that George Washington and the men who took part in founding the government understood the meaning and intent of their own work, then I maintain (and this is the battle-field of the whole discussion) that the declaration in the treaty with Tripoli was set forth as a political axiom, or first principle, lying at the very foundation of this government, and distinguishing it from all others. In other words, the fundamental doctrine of the Constitution in regard to the relations of this government to religion of any kind, and which forms a part of the supreme law of the land by which the states in the Union are to govern themselves in the matter of legislation, is this doctrine in the treaty that the United States government, as thus voluntarily and officially explained and defined by itself, is a purely secular corporation, sustaining no relation, either of approbation or antagonism, to any religion in existence. And this doctrine, although some bat-eyed people do not see it, is the very palladium of religious liberty, for it recognizes the fact that religion is a matter which concerns the individual, and not the civil government, and makes every church a free and independent institution, instead of being forced, as the church in Europe is, into an unnatural relation of union and dependence, where she is sure to compromise her character. But if the Constitution and the treaties made in conformity thereto are the supreme law of the land, then I maintain further that no state in the Union and no municipality in a state has a right to enact laws which go upon the presumption that this government is a religious government. The Continental Congress, representing the people of the colonies, in breaking away from their allegiance to the British Crown and founding a new government in the Western World, declared in the immortal act they committed on the 4th of July, 1776, that they took this step to secure the rights of human nature in general, and not their own in particular. As the human family is divided into many faiths, how could they do anything else than what they afterward did in making the government a mere secular institution, thus giving liberty and respect to the religious opinions of all who might dwell upon the soil? In the Declaration of Independence the founders of the government solemnly pledged themselves to protect the rights of man as man. In the Constitution they adopted, and the laws they enacted, and the treaties they made when the war was over, they redeemed the pledge to the very letter.

There is an antagonism, I admit, between some of the state constitutions and laws on the one side, and the doctrine of the national Constitution on the other, which I explain in this way: The general government was formed in 1787 out of the thirteen colonies or states, but these states were settled and organized long previous to that date by emigrants who came chiefly from the British Isles, where the Westminster Confession of Faith and the Solemn League and Covenant had been the law of the land, and had in great measure shaped the opinions of the people. The people of Europe could not then, nor can they now, conceive of a government existing at all unless closely and dependingly connected with the church. They cannot rid themselves of the notion that if the state does not support the church, either by giving funds or enforcing by law some of the claims she makes, everything like religion will die, and society fall back into its original barbarism. Hence the union and mutual dependence of the church and state. This is the doctrine of the Westminster Confession of Faith. When therefore Scotch, Irish, and English emigrants sought a home in this country they naturally brought these European ideas with them, and impressed them on the state constitutions and laws where they were settled. The present Sabbath laws of Pennsylvania date back to colonial times, and those of Massachusetts and Connecticut to the days of the Pilgrims. But when the government of the United States was organized out of the materials composing the old thirteen colonies it was a new creation altogether; and when the Constitution was adopted by the states respectively it nullified every law they had made inconsistent in letter and spirit with the national Constitution. This Constitution made the government under it a purely secular corporation, gotten up for secular purposes alone, ignoring the very existence of God, a future state of being, of religion of any kind, and abolishing the necessity of judicial oaths—not because the framers were Atheists, but because they believed that a civil government had nothing in the world to do with religion except to protect every man in the enjoyment of his religious belief and worship, whatever it might be. This peculiarity of our Constitution was not a mere opinion of the framers; for an opinion can be formed, and often is formed, on ex parte testimony; but it was a conviction, which is a state of mind following an examination of both sides of a question. They saw how the doctrine of a union of church and state in Europe had made the state a mere tool to do the persecuting work of the church, and had converted the church itself into the bloodiest institution known in history; and they resolved to proclaim an eternal separation between them in this country, for the safety of the people and for the honor of true religion. This they effectually did in the Constitution, by secularizing the government entirely, and by the treaty with Tripoli, now a part of the supreme law of the land, where they declared to the whole world that in no sense whatever is the government founded on the Christian religion, or on any religion. And I take the ground, which every constitutional lawyer will admit to be tenable, that all the state and municipal prohibitions and requirements which look as if this were a religious government, if a case involving the question could be carried up to the Supreme Court of the United States, must be pronounced to be utterly unconstitutional and void.

Rev. M. B. Anderson, D.D., at the recent Science Association at Saratoga Springs, read an able paper on the relation of Christianity to the common law, in which he comes to the conclusion that the common law is not based in any respect on the Christian religion, and that Christianity is no part of the law of the land. This paper is published in the Albany Law Journal, and the editor indorses Dr. Anderson's position.

It is gratifying to see that the spirit of Roger Williams still walks the earth, and has found embodiment in at least one Baptist minister who has not given up the principle of the founder of the sect in regard to the relation between the church and the state.

President Grant, in his last annual message to Congress, said that the church property in the United States then exempt from taxation amounted to some hundred millions of dollars; and that at its present rate of increase it will amount to three times that sum by the close of the century. Now, is it right to treat the free and independent churches of this country, who are able to own hundreds of millions worth of property, as if they were paupers, and could not pay their taxes? And even if the churches were willing to be so treated, is it right to tax the poor man's, or any other man's, house and lot for the support of the government while a body of rich men who invest hundreds of thousands in a church, or cathedral, oftentimes for money-making purposes, should pay no taxes on their property? Property is property, and the only subject of taxation, and whether little or much, should support the government that protects it. If a mob in New York or Philadelphia should destroy a church costing a million, the people of those cities would hav to make good the loss by a tax levied on their property. Is this right? It is so unjust that the Christian Statesman, the organ of the revolutionary party, before it underwent the process of tergiversation, declared in its columns that in justice church property ought to be taxed. But seeing afterward that to take this ground would weaken its argument for the religious character of the state as "a moral person" capable of having a creed, it showed the easy virtue of its character by giving up the principle. I am happy to say, however, that an infinitesimal number of the clergy, ashamed of the fact that the American church, as wealthy as it is, should accept government protection for their real estate while they pay no tax, agree that our claim is just. As things now are every private property owner is indirectly taxed to support a religion he does not believe in. The tax on hundreds of millions of dollars which the churches ought to pay, but do not, has to be made up by the people at large. This is in flagraut violation of the spirit of the Constitution, and ought not to continue.

II. The employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the army and navy, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by the public money, should be done away with.

The reason of this proposition is that the people of the country being so divided as they are in regard to religious creeds, it is wrong to use the money raised by the taxation of all to pay chaplains for religious services which the majority of tax-payers do not approve. The moment you elect or appoint a chaplain by governmental act you violate the wholesome provisions of the Constitution, and take a long step toward the union of church and state. This, and the utter indifference and profaneness which generally mark such religious services in Congress and elsewhere, show that a custom so unmeaning and useless should be given up.

This demand becomes the more reasonable and imperative when we notice the numerical weakness of the members of the church as compared with the est of our population. The Occident of California my authority for saying that out of forty-five millions of the American people now living under the flag, nine millions are professors of the Protestant religion in all its sects, and five millions professors of the Catholic religion, leaving thirty-one millions who do not profess the Christian religion in any shape or form. Even Moody, in a sermon preached at Cleveland, and published verbatim in the Leader of that city of the 11th of October last, thus discourses: "They call America a Christian nation, but has America room for the son of God? Does America want him? Suppose it could be put to a popular vote, do you suppose the nation would vote to hav him come and reign? He would not carry a ward in this city; you know it very well. He would not carry a town nor a precinct in the United States; you know it very well." Yet, in the face of these admitted facts, five millions of Catholics would like to subjugate to the pope of Rome the rest of the forty millions who are not Catholics, and the nine millions of Protestants would like to dominate over thirty-six millions who are not Protestants! And all this under a Constitution and government which hav announced to the world that they are purely secular, and do not recognize the existence of any religion at all. We hear about "cheek," presumption, arrogance, and impudent claims, but this takes the lead of anything we hav ever seen before. Just think of it, that a divided minority, one part consisting of five millions, and the other of nine millions, should attempt, respectively, to force their religious views and practices on an unresisting majority of more than thirty-one millions of American citizens!

III. All public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions ought to be discontinued.

During the years 1871-2-3, the corporation of New York city gave out of the public treasury to 103 Catholic institutions, too numerous to mention in detail, the sum of $1,396,389. To the Episcopal churches, schools, hospitals, and miscellaneous, $56,957. To the Reformed Dutch, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, and Lutheran churches, $112,193. Grand total, $1,534,534. Of this vast sum taken out of the people's treasury for unlawful purposes, the Catholics got 91 per cent of the whole, or $1,396,389, while the Protestants and Jews got only 7 per cent, or $138,145. According to this statement, which I take from the New York Times, the Protestants and Jews, with humble and spaniel-like greed, were only allowed to pick up the crumbs that fell from the table of their condescending masters, the Catholics. I ask your attention to the fact in the case that although all Protestant churches of this country are ostensibly and professionally opposed to a union of church and state, those in New York eagerly grabbed the hush-money that was offered them. Even the Baptists, who from the beginning of their existence as a sect were more thoroughly committed against the doctrine of the church plundering the state, gave up their distinctive principle and took the bribe. It looks as if the Catholics scattered the crumbs and picked bones around on the floor to keep the Protestant dogs from barking and arousing the tax-payers while they loaded themselves with the lion's share of the spoils. I am happy to say that, after the horse had been irrecoverably stolen for want of a lock on the stable door at the right time, the people of the state of New York, by a constitutional provision, hav put a stop to such proceedings in the future. And the churches that hav received their share of the plunder now occupy the position before the world of receivers of stolen goods. I exempt the Catholics from this reproach, because it has been a cardinal doctrine with them from the beginning that corporations, whether states or cities, owe them allegiance and tribute as the one infallible church with the pope at the head as the vicegerent of the Almighty. The utter dereliction of principle on the part of the Protestants, as shown in this case, confirms the truth of history that the ecclesiastical spirit is not a modest and a grateful spirit. If you give it an inch it will take an ell. In the time of Henry VIII. it had got possession of about a third part of the landed property of the kingdom of England, all exempt from taxation. It sits like an incubus upon the prosperity of every Catholic country in Europe to-day. It evinces the same grasping spirit in this country, and hence in reply to all demands for public money, whether by appropriations or exemptions from taxation, the people's motto ought to be, Not one farthing.

IV. The use of the Bible in the public schools as a book of religious worship, and the practice of religious exercises, ought to cease.

When school taxes are paid by Jews, Catholics, and Protestants indiscriminately, it is the most reasonable thing in the world that the religious scruples of these sects should be respected. No tax-paying Jew wants his children in the schools to hear the New Testament read in which he and his fathers are condemned and anathematized for unbelief in Jesus Christ as the Messiah, when during 1,800 years of persecution his race has given evidence that they did not believe it. No Catholic tax-payer wants his children indoctrinated in our Protestant belief, and to listen to religious exercises which he believes to be heretical and dangerous to their souls' salvation. And no Protestant wants his children to listen to prayers and ceremonies which he believes to be idolatrous. And the only way to protect all the tax-payers is to secularize the schools completely, forbidding by law all religious exercises in them, and allowing the children to get their religious opinions and training at home, in the Sunday-schools, Bible classes, and churches of the various sects.

More than thirty years ago, when acting as school director in the township in which I liv, I opposed the teachings of the Shorter Catechism in the public schools, although I then believed it was almost as much inspired as the Bible; and although the entire township and surrounding country were under strong Presbyterian influence. I did it because there was a principle involved. I saw that if the door of the schoolroom is once opened to the religious teachings of an orthodox sect because it is then in the majority, in the changes of population that are always occurring in this country, you could not shut it against the religious creed of a heterodox sect when it came into power. I hav lived to see in this same township a large Catholic population which is now clamoring for a division of the school funds. The thing called a principle is no respecter of persons. If we tie to it we must follow it through all its legitimate workings to its results. And therefore if the secularity of the government is a vital principle we should secularize the schools also. The founders of this republic, with all the religiousness of their characters, did not mention the name of God in the Constitution, for they well remembered that it was in that most sacred name that the despotisms of the Old World had trampled down the rights of humanity into the dust. Neither did they demand, but actually forbade, a religious or church qualification for holding office, for they had seen in England one generation after another trained by this policy into cowardly hypocrisy. In the convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, and which continued its sessions through sixteen months, there were no religious exercises observed any more than there is now in the meetings of a railroad company or of a bank. The grand peculiarity of the government they constructed, and which distinguished it from all others, is that there is dignity, but no divinity about it at all; that it is a mere expedient of human wisdom gotten up by the people for protecting the property and personal rights of the citizens generally, ignoring altogether the existence of any other world than this, and of any religious creed whatever. Our religion is a matter of the deepest concern to each one of us, but the government has nothing to do with it.

V. The appointment by the President of the United States, or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts ought to be discontinued.

I suppose it will be conceded that Thomas Jefferson understood the appropriate duties of President of the United States under the Constitution. But when holding that office he utterly refused to issue a proclamation for fasts or festivals, because while the people of the United States were at that time, and in their private capacity, generally Christian, and not Jewish, nor Mohammedan, nor Buddhistic, the government was neither the one nor the other. Warned by what he had seen with his own eyes in France and England of the deadly influence of the church upon the state; seeing how the people there were saddled, bridled, and rode by the clergy—Catholic and Protestant—he used his influence, both in the founding and administration of the new government, to save the American people from such a degradation. And hence, although he was as grateful for national blessings as any other man, he refused officially to proclaim a thanksgiving for fear of inviting a new encroachment from the ecclesiastical spirit.

VI. The judicial oaths in the courts of law, and in all the departments of the government, ought to be abolished, and simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury should be established in its stead.

The judicial oath is a remnant of the old European barbarism which regarded all men as unmitigated liars unless they stood in fear of eternal hell fire. It contains, and was intended to contain, a whole creed of dogmas repulsive at once to the intellect and to the common sense of justice and right among men. If the Constitution of the United States, and the laws and treaties made in accordance therewith, are the supreme law of the land, the spirit of the Constitution, laws, and treaties should be the polar star guiding the action of Congress, the state legislatures, and municipalities in any given case or question. Now in the Constitution there is no judicial oath required of any incumbent, from the President down to tide-waiter. That is to say, a government official is not required to take an oath which implies his belief of any religious dogma whatever. Had the oath which we see administered in our courts of justice been exacted of the men who framed the Constitution and composed the two houses of the first Congress, not one in fifty could hav held office at all! I think all honorable men will agree that a person who has intelligence and moral character enough to be called as a witness into a court of justice at all will be quite as likely to tell the truth when put upon his honor and conscience as he would if he took the usual oath. The futile effect of oaths in making men tell the truth has long been proverbial in the expression, "False as custom house oaths." I suppose it was owing to this fact that Jesus, in laying down the rules for his followers, said: "Swear not at all; let your communications be yea, yea; and nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil." It was never said nor believed that the testimony of a Quaker in a court of justice was in the least unreliable because he refused the oath and simply affirmed. In our penitentiaries and reform institutions it has been found that, generally speaking, convicts behave better when trusted, when an appeal is made to their manhood and sense of honor, than when treated as totally depraved.

VII. All laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath ought to be repealed.

As the Constitution of the United States knows no religion, of course it knows no Sabbath as a religious institution. Congress is frequently in session and legislates on Sunday. During our civil war battles were begun and fought on this day. The United States mails run on the Sabbath. Don't insult my understanding by saying what is not true, that these all come under the head of works of "necessity and mercy." When the Sabbath law was really in force upon the Jews, they allowed themselves, when at war, to be cut to pieces by their enemies rather than fight upon the Sabbath day; and well their enemies knew when to attack them. They put men to death if they gathered sticks to boil their pot of victuals on the Sabbath. In some of our states a commercial transaction is vitiated and nullified by law if it has taken place on the Sabbath; but the ratification of treaties and other most important business of Congress is as binding when transacted on Sunday as it is on any other day of the week.

At the time the Sunday laws were enacted, especially in the old thirteen states, there was no national government. In the whole country there were not probably fifty Jewish families who observed the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. No street cars carried their hundreds of passengers to their distant houses of worship. There were no Seventh Day Baptists whose conscience required them to obey the fourth command of the decalogue which declares that the seventh and not the first day of the week is the Sabbath. There were no millions of Germans and Swiss, as there are now, who had been taught by Luther and Calvin, and all the rest of the continental reformers, that the Sabbath was not binding on a Christian, but that every day in the week was holy. There were no hundreds of thousands of laboring men in our manufacturing cities, outside of all churches, who, after close and unhealthful confinement all week in their shops, make the Sunday a day of innocent recreation. If there is no law forbidding a man to worship at home, or in his church, on Sunday, is it fair to hav a law which forbids him not to worship? Who has authorized the Sabbatarian to be the keeper of other peoples consciences? Were John Calvin and Martin Luther fools who did not understand the New Testament? Is the Rev. Dr. Hopkins of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary at Auburn a fool also when he maintains, as he did during a meeting of the Evangelical Alliance of Pittsburgh, that the old Sabbath law of the Jews had expired by its own limitation, and that now instead of one holy day in the week we hav seven?

By a large class of our people who hav received their religious opinions from their parents just as they hav received their names, by inheritance, and without question, the observance of the Sabbath after the puritan way is set down as a requirement of what they call "Christian morality." But what is Christian morality? Did it condemn slaveholding which made merchandize of human beings? Does it condemn the sale and use of ardent spirits and tobacco which are shortening the lives of so many of our countrymen? Does it condemn Freeman, who, a few months ago, under direction as he supposed of the Almighty, and as an act of faith, took the life of his own child, believing with faithful Abraham, that God, in vindication of his faith, would assuredly raise her from the dead? Does it condemn the foreign missionaries who admit to their churches among the heathen, converts who still remain polygamists? Shall the Catholic church expound the meaning of Christian morality? Shall the hundreds of Protestant sects each undertake this hazardous work? The history of the church teaches us that what is called "Christian morality" has justified the most flagrant crimes and condemned the most essential virtues. Like the chameleon, it changes its complexion according to the surroundings, and is altogether indefinable and unreliable as a standard of duty.

Now, instead of setting up a court of casuistry to be presided over by the strongest sect of religionists for the time being, to decide special cases of "Christian morality," like the Spanish Inquisition, we Radicals propose that we fall back on those universal ideas of morality which all people in all ages understand, and which demand that in all our relations to our fellow-men we should do unto them as we would be done by in like circumstances. This was the golden rule of conduct which Christ laid down for the self-government of his disciples, and which he declared constituted the sum total of human duty. And this was the same rule of life which, five hundred years before the advent of Christ, Confucius taught the Chinese, and which has made them for ages a peace-loving people. This natural rule of ethics covers the relation which a man sustains to himself, and, as a permissive decree, allows and requires of him to seek his own happiness primarily, with the single proviso that in so doing he neither injures himself nor any other human being.

Now the propositions I hav submitted to you, and briefly discussed, form the Radical platform of state policy. Are not its demands fair and reasonable? Do we ask for ourselves anything that we do not cordially concede to all other citizens? It is not offered as a compromise, for that term implies always that the parties to the compromise giv up some right or truth for the sake of peace. But we claim it to be the true constitutional basis, and the only possible ground on which the American people can stand in the future, if they would avoid those complications with the church, the history of which is written in tears and blood. It can only be opposed by those, who, not being content with the privilege of believing any theological creed they please, demand, most unreasonably, that others shall be compelled to conform their belief to the church standard which happens for the time to be in the majority. I urge you one and all, in methods you deem best, to assist in preserving intact the American doctrine that the state is a secular institution, entirely separate from and independent of the church; and that the church shall not be permitted either to dictate legislation to the state or to depend upon it in any respect, except to be protected in the natural right of its individual members to such belief, worship, and ceremonial as each one may choose. The practical carrying out of this constitutional idea into the legislation of each state in the Union will make our beloved country not only the home of the brave but, what is far more glorious, the land of the free!

"Student" Responds to Kersey.

In regard to the numerous incorrect quotations in the "Bible of Bibles," Mr. Graves says that on page 440 of that book is "a full explanation," and adds: "They are designedly made verbally incorrect, because if they had not been abridged the chapter on Contradictions would hav occupied nearly a hundred pages of the book. I studied condensation as an art."

The "full explanation" on page 440 is as follows: "The author, in abridging citations from history and the Bible, has, in some cases, deviated from custom in using quotation marks. This is especially true of chapter twenty-two, on Bible Contradictions. It is believed that no errors of any importance can be found in this work, unless some mistakes hav been committed in making scriptural references."

Now let us apply these two explanations to the chapter aforesaid. The two hundred and thirty-four groups of contradictions are printed in solid small type and make only ten pages. I hav a copy of "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," published in 1860, containing one hundred and forty-four propositions, proved affirmatively and negatively by texts of scripture without comment. The type is larger than in Mr. Graves's chapter and the matter much more spread, and more passages are quoted on an average in each group. The whole makes less than forty-two pages, and, with Mr. Graves's typographical condensation, could hardly hav extended beyond twenty pages.

Of the two hundred and thirty-four propositions, or groups, in Mr. Graves's book, I am unable to find more than eighty-eight which are essentially different from the one hundred and forty-four; and his additions would not hav increased the number of pages of "Self Contradictions of the Bible" more than one-third or a quarter.

And now as to the quotations being "designedly made verbally incorrect" to avoid their occupying "nearly a hundred pages," and Mr. Graves's study of "condensation as an art." Out of ten consecutive Bible quotations (group 14 to 18, inclusive, of the "Bible of Bibles"), I find but one passage verbally correct. One other is entirely incorrect. In the remaining eight there are twenty-four words that are erroneous, and the substitution of thirty words for the twenty-four would hav made the quotations perfectly correct and the sense just as clear as with the erroneous words. One of these incorrect passages consists of two texts connected by a semicolon and with one of the references omitted.

It seems to me, therefore, that these variations were carelessly, rather than "designedly, made," and that the author's study of "condensation as an art," resulting in the saving of six words out of thirty, was not much of a success.

It appears that Mr. Graves has denied that he ever read the pamphlet "Self-Contradictions of the Bible." In the Cincinnati Gazette of January 16, 1880, the reviewer says: "A comparison of the two lists shows a remarkably accordant selection of texts and an apparent working over and division of one allegation into several. Furthermore, we hav been informed that Mr. Graves once accepted a copy of the work from its author, but we will not question his veracity."

I believe Mr. Graves is silent thus far in regard to any of the points contained in that late general review of his works.

STUDENT.

Thirty-Second Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism.

The Spiritualists of Rochester and a goodly number from adjacent towns convened at the Academy of Music, 40 and 42 State street, at 10 o'clock, A.M Mrs. Amy Post, the venerable and well-known philanthropist, was appointed president; Benj. Fish, Schuyler Moses, Edward Jones, and Mrs. Dr. Butterfield, vice-presidents; D. M. Fox and Mrs. B. Fish, secretaries.

Mrs. Post called the meeting to order and said she supposed she ought to thank the people for the honorable position she occupied, but really she felt incompetent to discharge the duties incumbent upon her. She felt it to be a great occasion, being one of the first to investigate the rappings, and being convinced of their reality, she was converted from a disbeliever to a full believer in another life, and had never since doubted. There is no uncertainty about it; we hav proof positive, through the many phases of the phenomena, of a continuous life. She said she could giv many interesting experiences connected with the early manifestations and the bitter persecutions of the Fox girl mediums; but she would refrain, and call them to the duties of the hour. She hoped all the proceedings might be conducted harmoniously, and good results follow from the proceedings of the meeting.

Mrs. Fox then read that beautiful poem "Jubilante," by Miss Doten, commencing with the lines:

"The world hath felt a quickening breath
From heaven's eternal shore,
And souls triumphant over death,
Return to earth once more.
For this we hold our jubilee,
For this with joy we sing,
'O grave, where is thy victory?
'O death, where is thy sting?'"

Mr. J. W. Seaver was then introduced, and delivered the opening address—earnest, eloquent, and logical. He was listened to with deep interest and marked attention from the opening to the close. Among other things, he related that at Chautauqua Lake, last summer, Bishop Forster addressed a vast audience. During his discourse the bishop said that if he were asked whether we are to liv after death, he could not say he knew whether we should or not; but if asked if he believed so, he could answer yes. Had this question been addressed to the speaker he said he could hav answered that he knew that there is a life after death, if his own senses could be relied on.

Mrs. Nettie Pease Fox being called for by the audience, responded briefly. She paid a glowing tribute to the mediums, referring to them as the power through which modern Spiritualism had been so widely promulgated in such a brief period of time. She referred specially to Mrs. Cora L. N. Richmond, Miss A. W. Sprague. Mrs. Brigham, Mrs. Hyzer, Lizzie Doten, Nettie Coburn Maynard, and others, all eloquent, efficient instruments in the hands of angels in the accomplishment of the wonderful work wrought out. These mediums hav been the saviors of the nineteenth century, and as one of old, the church, and the unbelieving world had cried, "Crucify them! crucify them!" It is probable that on one occasion the Fox girls, the first mediums for those rapping manifestations, would hav been sacrificed to the fury of the mob but for the efforts of the noble woman who occupies to-day the place of honor on our rostrum. But the world has indeed as yet felt only the first "breath from heaven's eternal shores." Great progress has been made, but little in comparison with what is to be. The world is just ready to acknowledge the claims of Spiritualism; but it wants more than knowledge—it wants kindness, sympathy, and love.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

After the reading of a poem entitled "A Religion for all Humanity," communications were read from Prof. J. R. Buchanan, John Wetherbee, A. E. Newton, Nettie C. Maynard, and others.

Following the reading of the communication from Nettie C. Maynard, Mr. Seaver related a conversation with her, in which she gave an account of some of her experiences as a medium with Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States. During some of the darkest days of the Rebellion he came to her for advice from the spirits. A gentleman present also gave some additional facts he had obtained in Springfield, Ill., the home of Mr. Lincoln, all confirming the positive evidence we hav that Mr. Lincoln was in belief a Spiritualist.

The Chairman of the Committee then reported resolutions from which we giv the following extracts:

Resolved, That we heartily rejoice in the wonderful progress of Modern Spiritualism, its phenomenal manifestations and revolutionizing teachings having already spread to almost every part of the globe, shaking the foundations of temples of superstition, where sat priests, and the thrones of tyranny occupied by kings, the one binding the souls, the other the bodies of mankind.

Resolved, That we recognize in Spiritualism the chief instrumentality effective in the reformatory movements of the last thirty years, resulting in banishing from the teachings of the pulpit many of the horrid dogmas of old theology; the inculcating more liberal views of religion, of political and social life; the enactment of laws more humanitarian in character; the mitigation of punishment in our prisons, and the introduction of reforms for ameliorating the conditions of human life.

Resolved, That we regard Spiritualism as the special power efficient in the abolition of serfdom and slavery, having positive evidence that the Czar of Russia and Abranam Lincoln, President of the United States, by whom this great work was accomplished, were each, in their official acts, guided by spirit direction, given through some four well-known mediums.

Resolved, That we would specially acknowledge our indebtedness to Spiritualism for the marked progress made in the emancipation of women from many of the oppre-sions of the past, the inferior position in which she had been placed by the teachings of the Bible and Christian legislation, and for her advancement toward the place she is finally to occupy as the equal of man in all the avocations of life.

Resolved, That we regard Spiritualism not as an outgrowth of Christianity, but as a new manifestation of spirit power in the world, better calculated for the uplifting of humanity than any old form of religion; hence we see no propriety in putting the prefix "Christian" to Spiritualism.

Resolved, That while acknowledging with gratitude the inestimable blessings that hav come to us through Spiritualism, ... ing satisfactory answer to the question, "If a man die, shall he liv again?" we also believe that it has to do with the life that now is; hence Spiritualists should interest themselves and participate in all movements having for their object the making this world better. We earnestly appeal to all Spiritualists in their individual and associate capacity, to oppose the punishment of the unfortunate victim of crime, except so far as may be necessary for the protection of society, and the reformation of the criminal. That we condemn the cruelties resorted to by prison officials, and the contract system of selling the time of the convicts; believing that all receipts for labor performed by them, beyond their actual support, should be given to their families, or in case they hav no one depending upon them for support, kept for their benefit, to be paid at the time of discharge. Further, that we are opposed to that relic of barbarism, the gallows, and earnestly demand the repeal of all laws granting to courts the power to inflict the death penalty, being cruel, vindictive in character, and publicly demoralizing. We are opposed to war, and favor the settlement of all national difficulties by arbitration.

Resolved, That we recognize in the National Liberal League an efficient agency for the accomplishment of great good; we favor the principles upon which it is based, and will labor to accomplish its objects.

Resolved, That the innovations of the church upon the institutions of the government, the rights of the people, and the liberties of the press hav become most alarming; and that we regard the arrest, unjust conviction, and imprisonment of D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as an outrage unparalleled in the history of this country.

Resolved, That we hav for encouragement the fact that more than ever before, during the last year, scientists of Europe and America hav been induced to investigate the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism, and hav admitted its claims. In fact, we believe the time near at hand when scientists, as a class, will admit that the revelations of Spiritualism demonstrate the existence of a spirit world peopled with intelligences once inhabitants of this earth. Further, that the Christian church will be driven to the acknowledgment of the same fact, and then will come the greatest danger, for the church will claim it as its own, deny, as it has of all progressive movements in the past, that it ever opposed "true" Spiritualism, and endeavor to pour the wine of the new dispensation into the bottles of old theology. Hence we are opposed to all organizations based upon creeded expressions of belief, as tests of membership.

These resolutions were fully discussed with deep interest, and all unanimously adopted.

During the discussion Mr. Fish related his early experiences with Spiritualism. He ridiculed, like others, at first. He did not think that a person who had passed from earth would come back again, but on a closer acquaintance with the new movement his old philosophy was knocked from under him. Traveling a great deal at the time, he found the new idea everywhere ridiculed, and when he admitted that he was a believer in Spiritualism people thought him a little deranged and imagined they saw a wild light in his eyes.

During discussion of the first resolution Mr. Seaver said certain manifestations occurred in Byron three or four years before, through clairvoyance, which demonstrated immortality as Spiritualism. Clairvoyance was one of the stepping stones of Spiritualism. A Mr. Walker, of Byron, mesmerized a Mrs. Tuttle in order to extract a painful tumor. While in a mesmeric state this lady described the tumor, disagreeing with the description of the surgeon who had examined it. It was subsequently proved that Mrs. Tuttle was correct. From that time to this she has successfully treated all kinds of diseases, all by the help of clairvoyance. At one time, while in a trance, she began to weep; the cause of her weeping was that three spirits were present, demanding to speak to relatives through her. One of these spirits was her mother. They communicated with their relatives, and what they said was taken down, and their words were afterwards verified. This manifestation demonstrated the immortality of souls in the speaker's opinion.

Mrs. Post said that no one probably had changed his train of thought more thoroughly than she. She had for a long time been in doubt as to immortality, but doubted no more after having been converted to Spiritualism. It has been a source of great comfort to her.

A long discussion followed the reading of the sixth resolution in regard to the term "Christian Spiritualism." Mr. Bottom, of Canandaigua, thought the teaching of Christ was one of love; he did not promulgate any science. To Mr. Harding the term Christianity was most hateful. The society that went under that name had always been most unrelenting and bloodthirsty. This had been the case, no matter how far back in time we may go, since its beginning. Christianity had instituted most horrible persecutions and caused most terrible suffering to the innocent and helpless in the world; it had shocked all humanity by its excesses. He thought it almost too horrible to contemplate that all these old institutions and creeds were allowed to continue and be in power. Mr. Saulisbury would not do away with the name, as Christianity had done much good as well as evil. He did not favor the forcible removal of any institution in the world. Whatever institutions there are must be outgrowths to the needs of the times and the nature of things. They would do away with themselves after having become useless and no longer wanted.

Mrs. Fox thought Christ had been a good man and medium, but no greater than Socrates, Plato, Confucius, and other ancients. She did not favor connecting Spiritualism with any religion, as it was an entirely new departure. Christianity teaches that mankind is retrograding and sinking lower and lower; Spiritualism teaches that the race is continually improving. Christianity teaches that human nature is vile and degraded; Spiritualism teaches that it is pure and immortal. Christianity teaches that man was and is totally depraved and needs a savior; Spiritualism teaches that he must be his own savior, that he has been his own savior in the past, and will be in the future.

In the evening Mrs. Fox delivered an address in verse, which closed the exercises. A sociable had been announced after the close of the lecture, but it was decided by vote to postpone this till next Friday evening.

The American Labor Reform League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please say in this week's issue that the "Tenth Annual Convention of the American Labor League meets in Science Hall, New York, Sunday and Monday, May 2d and 3d, at 10 30 A.M., and 2.30 P.M. Sunday (the evening session being omitted to enable people to attend the Bennett Reception), and forenoon, afternoon, and evening Monday. J. K. Ingalls, Henry Appleton, Wm. Hanson, E. H. Heywood, Myra Hall, J. H. Swain, and other speakers.

Truly yours, E. H. HEYWOOD.

Princeton, Mass., April 19, 1880.

W. S. Bell's Lectures.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. W. S. Bell, who is so widely and favorably known to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER as a lecturer and author, deilvered his lecture on "The Modocs in Heaven," at the Athenæum Hall in Morrisania, New York, on the 19th inst. The classical and Christian ideas of hell were forcibly compared, much to the disadvantage of the latter, which the speaker asserted to be the meanest hell yet invented. That the modern doctrine has produced immeasurable suffering to the human race was proved by the distracting influence which it exercised in drawing man away from a true understanding of the nobler work called for by the present life to the continual contemplation of the fearful possibilities which awaited him in the future world. That the doctrine is not put forth prominently in the pulpit at the present day does not change the fact that a belief in it does, and of necessity must, underlie every system of theology which holds to the idea of redemption and atonement, as these ideas hav no relevancy except in view of the necessity of a salvation from future torment. Mr. Bell is both an easy and forcible speaker, with thorough command of the language necessary to express his thoughts; and by long and patient study he has admirably qualified himself for his position among the leaders of the Liberal movement. ## Liberal League Notes.

THE National Appeal says: "Dr. French, of Hillsdale, writes that they are ready to form a League at that place, and Abner Hitchcock, of Battle Creek, Mich., informs us their application for a charter has already gone forward."

HON. A. B. BRADFORD, of Enon Valley, Pa., has just published a pamphlet of fifteen pages entitled "An Exposition of Liberalism and a Defense of the Demands of the National Liberal League." Like everything else from the pen of Mr. Bradford, it is able, and every person who desires to become well posted on the issues that the Liberal League presents should send twenty-five cents to Mr. Bradford and obtain half a dozen copies. [The reader will find this address in the present issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.—ED. T. S]

I LEARN from C. A. Dunning, the Liberal League representative of Michigan, that League organizations are progressing very rapidly in that state, and they propose to hav more Leagues than the state of Kansas in a short time. I fear our Michigan friends will find that Kansas is a hard state to beat in such a conflict, but I shall be pleased to see such a contest progressing. I am confident there are more Liberals in those two states than in any other two of the same size in the Union, and if they get really awakened we may expect to see a great work done. But I desire to say to my Liberal friends of the Empire state that they must look to their laurels. We now number but a few more Leagues than Kansas, and if our brothers in that state and Michigan get into a contest for the supremacy, we may soon find New York third on the list as to the number of auxiliary Leagues.

THE following I clip from Mind and Matter, the Spiritualist paper of Philadelphia, which I am pleased to know is rendering good service to the League cause. Allow me to suggest to those Spiritualists who desire to subscribe for a paper that advocates both the cause of Spiritualism and the Liberal League movement that they can do no better than to subscribe for Mind and Matter. This is the item: "Liberal League No. 173 was organized in this city on Friday evening, April 9th. The following-named were elected as officers: President, Dr. R. C. Flower; Vice-Presidents, Mr. S. Wheeler and Mrs. Sada Bailey; Secretary, George D. Coleman; Treasurer, J. O. Bentley; Councillors, J. M. Roberts, Henry Wiley, Mrs. C. A. Coleman, and Mrs. E. A. Palmer. Committees were appointed to draft by-laws. Adjourned to meet at the call of the secretary."

MR. T. C. CORNETT, Secretary of Liberal League No. 170, of Dallas, Texas, sends me a very encouraging report from this League. The League has just perfected a permanent organization by electing for its officers the following-named persons: John Stone, President; D. McKay, Vice-President; T. C. Cornett, Secretary and Treasurer, and John Jackson, Mrs. Sallie Baker, J. H. Slaughter, and J. K. Hawes, Councillors. Bro. Cornell says: "The great desideratum with us in Texas is lecturers. We find it difficult to induce men of means to join our ranks, and this, together with the fact that nearly all our lecturers liv at a considerable distance, leaves us at a disadvantage, and almost excludes us from any benefit to be derived from their ability. It seems to me it would be advisable for the National Liberal League to institute a lecture bureau, whose duty it would be to divide this country into convenient districts, and assign a lecturer to each. Such an arrangement would lessen traveling expenses considerably, and would put lecturers within the reach of all pecuniarily."

MR. WILLIAM E. SCOTT, of New York city, has the following good word to say of Truth, the new New York daily: "I mail you the most outspoken political paper against Comstock & Co. that is published in this city. It has not been long in existence, but has already acquired a large circulation, which is fast increasing. It is just the paper that New York has long been in need of, and, by the way, it exposes the corruptions and frauds of the Christians now and then in a brave manner. It think it will aid the Liberal cause very much, for the reason there are many Christians who will read this 'political' paper who think it would soil their hands to touch THE TRUTH SEEKER or Boston Investigator. Truth has ridiculed the Daily Witness, an orthodox paper, out of ...

A Little Tough on the Pigs.

BY M. BABCOCK.

The Bible teaches that there is a personal devil, who is commander-in-chief of an eternal hell. And it tells us that on the great day of judgment the wicked shall be placed upon the left hand, and God will say to them, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv, 41). And Jesus says, "He who believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he who believeth not shall be damned."

Now let me tell a Bible-story about devils, and remember, Jesus has said except you believe it that you shall be damned. Once on a time, a long time ago, there was a man who was troubled with a pain in his stomach. His friends bound him with chains, but he brake the chains, and picked up sharp stones, with which he cut his flesh, so great was his distress. Just at this time there came a ship to the coast, and Jesus stepped on shore. "And when the man saw Jesus far away he ran and worshiped him, and cried with a loud voice, and said, What hav I to do with thee, Jesus, thou son of the most high God? I adjure thee, by God, that thou torment me not. (For he said unto him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit.) And he asked him, What is thy name? And he answered, saying, My name is Legion, for we are many. And he besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country. Now there was nigh unto the mountains a great herd of swine feeding. And all of the devils besought him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them. And forthwith Jesus gave them leave. And the unclean spirits went out and entered into the swine; and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea (they were about two thousand) and were choked in the sea" (Mark v, 1–13).

A legion is from three to five thousand, says Webster. So it is not surprising that the man should feel a sort of a fullness in his stomach, and at times, when the 5,000 devils were having a high old time among themselves, that he should be in great distress. But where did so many devils come from, since there was but one devil at the outset? Can it be that the old devil had been engaged in the overshadowing business? Or is it true that all of these devils were once holy angels and that God had thrown them out of heaven on account of their wickedness?

The account goes to show that Jesus was possessed of a very obliging disposition towards the devils, and the programme, without doubt, was very nice for the devils. But don't you think the arrangement was a little tough on the pigs? Don't you think that it was a little tough on the owner of those hogs?

Jesus entered into and sanctioned a plan by which a peaceable, honest man was robbed of his whole drove of hogs, and that, too, just to oblige a miserable nest of devils. It was nothing more nor less than a case of highway robbery on the part of Jesus. Now, in my judgment, Jesus made a great mistake in not protecting the man's property. He had better hav sent the devils out of the country—sent them to hell, and saved the hogs.

Now I want to ask an honest question. Is there a man or a woman in the whole world who, being possessed of full reason, believes this story to be true? Was it an actual fact that two thousand hogs were run into the sea by a lot of devils, as narrated by St. Mark in the New Testament? But if you say that this hog-story is but a fable, how do you know that the next or that any other statements in the Bible are not of the same kind? It is told in straightforward, plain language, and Jesus says that "he who believeth not shall be damned."

If, as it is said, Jesus was able to perform miracles, why did he not so arrange as to hav the devils choke in the sea instead of in the hogs? By choking the devils to death, and then enabling the pigs to swim ashore, Jesus would hav done a big thing in the interest of humanity and would hav done the man no harm.

Jesus is said to hav cast out seven devils at the time Mary Magdalene was not feeling very well. But he never killed a single one of them. He was never known to kill a devil; but he spent forty days and forty nights in the company of one devil up in the mount; went there expressly to be tempted by the devil, and I must say that in fooling away so much valuable time in such bad company he might hav spent his time better.

Not a devil out of the whole lot was killed; every one was again ready for business and ready to enter into another person when he should find out that he had gone to sleep with his mouth open.

Now believe this story or be damned; and don't say you will be damned if you do, but say you will be damned if you don't.

"Logic of Facts.—Logic of Errors."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Spiritualism, for many reasons, is like that "poor old dog Tray"—it gets stoned, kicked, and roughly treated from every quarter. Ministers fabricate and teach the vilest falsehoods, while Materialists misrepresent and belittle it in a manner that proves them to be everything but lovers of fair play. They always know of at least one medium who was, or is, a fraud, and upon that they seem to base all their knowledge of Spiritualism. Others, because a few Freelovers happen to be Spiritualists, continually repeat, parrot-like, "Oh, yes, your Spiritualists are all Freelovers." Such generally know more of free lust than they do of Freelove, and they know as little of Freelove as they do of Spiritualism.

Now I demand fair play. If they cannot accede to this, then let them mind their business. Let us alone. If they cannot, or will not, recognize the truth, don't say anything about us or Spiritualism, and it will be better for all concerned.

In The Truth Seeker of April 3d, Mr. Charles Audley very kindly tells the world that over in Europe he found a couple of frauds, and seems to think because he discovered them to be such he has exploded all there is of Spiritualism. I will kindly say to Mr. Audley that in his treatment of those mediums, as reported in The Truth Seeker, he simply exposed his ignorance (I had rather say ignorance than hatred) of Spiritualism and mediumship. He says the following conversation occurred:

"Will Mr. Walker say whether he is now under the control of the spirit of Mungo Park or not?"

"I am under the control of Mungo Park."

"Can your control hear and see what I am doing without your bodily organs?"

"Yes."

Now if Mr. Audley had investigated Spiritualism nine years instead of lecturing on it, he would hav known that that was not a proper question to ask—that Mr. Walker could not answer questions while under the control of Mungo Park or any other spirit; therefore he not only on that occasion betrayed his ignorance, but also to every reader of The Truth Seeker who knows anything about Spiritualism. If Mr. Walker was really controlled by the spirit of Mungo Park on that occasion, then that spirit saw at once that he had an ignoramus or a cheat to deal with, so answered him just as I would. A fool is answered according to his folly. One of two things is certain: either Mr. Audley was answered according to the above rule, or else Walker was a fool or a fraud. In the latter case, there is not a Spiritualist in the land, of any sense, but would hav discovered that there were two frauds or two fools in that crowd.

My opinion is that the spirit discovered Mr. Audley's motive and business—that he was a lecturer on Spiritualism, but not a Spiritual lecturer, and would treat the truth as a lie, therefore, in mercy to the man, gave him what he wanted—a lie—"according to his folly."

I, for one, do not wish to argue this question with those who are not disposed to be just, or who manifest a total ignorance of what Spiritualism is. E. A. Chapman.

Romanism the Alpha and Omega of America.

THEY DISCOVERED IT, EXPLORED IT, GAVE IT ITS LIBERTY, AND WILL HOLD IT WHEN ALL ELSE FAIL.—EXTRACT FROM A LATE SPEECH OF BISHOP GILMORE OF CLEVELAND, OHIO.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The above-named eminent personage of the Roman church of this country has recently delivered himself of a great speech at Cleveland, which is published in full in the Cleveland Plain-dealer of April 5th, in which he claims that Catholicism discovered and explored this country, and that the religious liberties of this country were copied from the Catholic Magna Charta of England, and obtained originally from canon law of the Romish church; that the Catholics of Maryland were the teachers and givers of our republican liberties when the republic was formed.

He claims now eight million Catholics in this country; admits that many children born in this country of Catholic parents leave the church, and that their main strength comes by emigration direct from Catholic Ireland and other Catholic countries, but that in the end they will scoop the whole thing.

He closed his discourse with the following words. I quote:

Even the present freedom of England, of which Englishmen are so proud, is the direct result and creation of the Catholic Magna Charta of Catholic time. Now, in the face of these facts, which no quibbling nor explaining will successfully change, and for whose accuracy I stand pledged, I ask: Are Catholics the enemies of republics? Catholics, who hav created and fostered all the republics the world has ever had, and who hav given our great country all the laws and principles we hav that in any manner make a republic at all? Take away the principles of the great Catholic Magna Charta on which our republic is built, and from which it has all the principles of religious freedom which Catholic Maryland taught and gave us; take away our courts and common law, which are the direct creation of canon law applied to civil life, and you will hav very little left, and very little to boast of, except the carrying out and the putting into practice the principles that Catholicity created and handed to the world as her gift to mankind. In the face of these facts, I ask: Hav Catholics no rights in America? Are we here by tolerance? Hav we done nothing to merit the right to speak and act as free Americans? or hav we done nothing for the country to merit our fair share not only in the direction of public affairs, but in the distribution of public favors? Are we helots? or has the Catholic minority no rights in the face of the Protestant majority? We discovered the country; we explored the country; we hav done more than our full share to open up and develop the country; we hav fought for the country; we hav given our treasure and our blood for the country; we hav given the country the great Magna Charta that makes us freemen, and the Catholic church stands to-day the only religious element that can or will stem the tide of Infidelity and indifferentism that is so wide-spread and so gravely threatens to destroy the virtue of the people and turn us into a nation of brawlers and demagogues.

Note further. He continues:

Religion is fast passing away; forms and faith are loosing their hold on the hearts of the people; Protestantism has run its course and is now living on its past; it has no future; it is like the stately tree that has reached its end; it is dying at the top or split into fragments, and it no longer controls the masses. The crowds that hasten to listen to a Beecher preaching a religion without Christ, and applaud an Ingersoll preaching bold and open Infidelity, tell in words that find no contradiction whither we are drifting. On the other hand, Catholicity is pre-eminently conservative; it is one of the grave charges made against the church that she will not run with the age. Men need some controlling power if they are to be saved from themselves, and that power is religion. Protestantism is dead and can not help us, far less save us. Catholicity is a living religion and will endure to the end. It alone can or will save us; and as it has given us the basis and germ of all we hav in the principles of civil and religious liberty, so it will giv us the religion we crave, the strength we need, and the star that is to guide us through the perilous sea we are now upon.

Science, Falsely So Called.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The recent birth at Philadelphia of a young elephant, and the manner in which it procures nourishment from its mother, remind us how naturalists, in the name of science, hav been for ages misleading the people. Science means knowledge in contradistinction to belief, founded on mere hearsay evidence. Before these scientific writers laid down the statement in their books that a new-born elephant, in a way nobody could conceive of, drew milk from its mother's teats by its trunk, or proboscis, they should hav gone to the natural habit of the animal and observed the fact. But arching their proud brows with a consciousness of the infallibility of their own ipse dixit, they dogmatically taught two errors. First, that elephants never bred in captivity; and secondly, that the young elephant in his native wilds drew milk from its mother's udder by means of its trunk. Hebe, the mother of the young calf at Philadelphia, which it is proposed to christen "America," is an elephant in captivity, and her offspring, when it feeds, sucks like a lamb, a colt, or any other mammal.

A few years ago Mr. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa., published a little tract in The Truth Seeker on the method by which marsupial animals propagated their kind. Besides shocking the delicate sensibilities of Mr. Comstock, who charged Mr. Bennett with obscenity for publishing it, and who was ridiculed at Washington for his ignorance, this tract created a division among people addicted to the study of natural history; one party saying, Pooh! pooh! because Prof. Owen, of England, has declared in his book that, although the marsupials are implacental animals, they are nevertheless placental animals; and that the young kangaroo and the young opossum are created in a womb, where they sustain some kind of a placental relation to their mothers, while the other party cited the evidence of observers that the method of propagation was otherwise.

The arrogance and presumption of so-called "scientific" men in declaring things to be true which they do not know to be true, cannot be too severely reproved, and it shows that dogmatism, in its most offensive form, is not confined to the church, which claims a "thus saith the Lord" for all its deliverances. It would be a very easy thing to procure a pair of opossums and carefully watch the modus propagandi, so that the observer could be able to say scio, I know, instead of credo, I believe. If naturalists would make this experiment, instead of jabbering dogmatic nonsense, I think they would discover that an implacental animal is not a placental animal, but that the young of a marsupial grows naturally on the teat of its mother in a kind of rudimental state, and remains so until it is vivified in the manner described by Mr. Bradford in his tract. An argument, or a theory, or an assertion is not worth one grain of sand in the presence of opposing facts. Dr. Lardner made an argument which concerned everybody, that Uranus was the outermost planet in our solar system. But Galle, in Germany, afterwards discovered Neptune far beyond the orbit of Uranus. What was his argument worth? Nothing. It is a very easy thing for a naturalist who scouts the Baconian systems of induction to make an ass of himself without appearing to know the fact.

A Seeker After Truth.

George R. Wendling.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It was announced by flaming handbills posted in many conspicuous places in our town that "George R. Wendling, the king of the platform, would deliver his famous lecture; subject, 'Reply to Ingersoll from a secular standpoint,'" etc., etc., the faithful agreeing to raise him sixty-four dollars for the same.

He came and delivered the aforesaid lecture on Saturday evening, the 27th inst., but failed to make any decided impression upon his audience except that it was lucky for him that Ingersoll was a long way off.

During Saturday afternoon some two or three hundred copies of the open letter to him were distributed about town and one copy sent the speaker, who also saw some of them during the afternoon. No reply was made or allusion to it during the lecture, and it was expected by many that he would reply to it on Sunday evening, but, strange to say, he could not possibly stay, Sunday though it was; and as no trains run on our railroad that day he got some railroad hands to take him on a hand-car to the next county seat at a cost of at least five times as much as if he had waited for Monday's train, looking very much as if he had not the ability and courage to answer the ugly questions in said letter, and that also he, while advertising to make "an unanswerable vindication of Christianity," had but little respect for the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath. But of such is the kingdom of—orthodoxy. John T. Miller.

The following is the open letter referred to:

Memphis, Mo., March 26, 1880.

To Geo. R. Wendling: From posters in town, I see you are to answer "Ingersoll from a secular standpoint." I looked in a dictionary and find that secular means "worldly, not spiritual." If admitting that your Bible is a myth and a fable, and you hav no defense for it that will pass with thinking people who read it, then how will you answer Ingersoll?

I gather from your term, "secular standpoint," that you argue that 'tis better to believe a lie than to know the truth; and if you will come out square on that kind of standpoint we will find plenty of able men to argue that point with you.

You say, "Go to Ingersoll for consolation for the death of a dear one!" I say no! Go to the Christian religion and console yourself that there are infants in hell only a span long. Go to Jesus, who says that many are called but few are chosen, and that many go the broad and few the narrow road; he who came not to bring peace but a sword; to set the father against the son and the son against the father; he who cursed a fig-tree, and sends the accursed (who will not hate father and mother, brother and sister and follow him) into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his imps; he whose religion to establish and perpetuate has caused rivers of blood to flow—enough to float all the navies in the world.

I hear that you fume about the Paris Commune, but are silent about the Spanish Inquisition, the rack, the prison, the thumbscrews, and fagot, the Protestant laws of England that hanged, then disemboweled and quartered Catholics, then boiled and hung the quarters up in public places. Do you touch on the Salem witchcraft and then say 'tis better to believe your Bible than to know the truth? You call the pagans, the Mohammedans, and other believers in gods and devils, Infidels, and they call you the same, and then you show up that the Infidels hav burned Bibles and murdered people. I defy you to show an instance wherein believers in no god or gods, or saviors, or devils ever persecuted others on account of difference of opinion.

The following is some of the inspiration from the God you would hav us believe in: Exodus xvii, 18, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." How many thousands hav been put to death on account of that divine verse? Num. xxxi, 17, 18, "Now, therefore, kill every male among the little ones, and every woman that hath known man by lying with him; but all the women-children that hav not known man by lying with him keeep alive for yourselves." Nice piece of inspiration, isn't it? Yet such commands, and even worse, are frequently given in your Bible. Would a just God giv the husband only the right to be divorced from the wife, and not giv the woman the same privilege for the same offenses? Read the eleventh chapter of Judges.

Ingersoll don't take stock in a God who delivers up a nation to be murdered for that kind of pay; read the fourteenth chapter of Judges, nineteenth verse, where to pay off a debt your God helps a man kill thirty others. Read the eleventh and twelfth chapters of 2 Samuel, about how the saint David got another man's wife, then notice in particular the eleventh and twelfth verses of the twelfth chapter. See how David is punished, and the thin pretext upon which your God kills the innocent little child.

Your Bible is full of just such justice as this. (Read Hosea xiii, 16.) Are you prepared to defend the God of Hosea? Read 1 Sam. xvi, 2—how your God instructs a man to tell a lie. I say read and re-read the whole mess of garbage, and see that the more you read the less you will believe, or any other man.

If on the rock Christ you build your dogmas, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against you, why are you so concerned about Ingersoll? Is it not the finest church and the best-paid preacher, the best music and easiest seats that draw the crowd? Do you get converts by reading or explaining God's word? Do you not hav to picture death-bed scenes to scare the wicked, and tell affecting stories to catch the good? Do you not tell stories suited to all phases of humanity? Do you know more about any god or devil than I do? Is yours or any minister's promise to pay considered any better in business circles than Ingersoll's? If you don't propose to defend the Jewish Jehovah and his God-book, what in the earth are you after around out here answering Ingersoll, where he has never been and is hardly known?

Perhaps you are after the $64. Ingersoll has offered $100 to any minister who would read to his audience certain passages of Holy Writ. Perhaps he will make you the same offer. That will beat $64, and you won't hav to put on any great degree of eloquence to satisfy the audience. Ready to hear from you at any time, I remain, Yours respectfully, JOHN T. MILLER.

Dissent.—Assent.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: While I agree with Mr. Herbold that Materialism and Spiritualism are the very antitheses of each other, and that they are to be the final contestants on the scientific and metaphysical battle-fields of the future, I cannot agree with him that it would be the better for us and the cause of Freethought to sever our connection with the Spiritualistic wing of the Liberal army. The question before us to-day is not the truth of Spiritualism or of Materialism, but the very existence of our free institutions and the sovereignty of the individual. There are too many practical reforms awaiting our recognition, too much work for humanity needing to be done, for us to waste our time and strength contending with each other. We should lay our own ism aside and join hands and hearts to elevate our kind, to destroy tyrannies, to establish justice, and to usher in the era of love and liberty. We hav complained of the narrowness and bigotry of Christians; we hav seen and condemned their phariseeism, their refusal to work shoulder to shoulder with those of differing beliefs for the practicalization of reforms, and now shall we imitate them? I sincerely hope not, and trust that we shall not be so blind as to fail to see the coming storm wherein all who do not bow the knee to the respectable powers that be will be swept from the face of the earth unless they shall be wise enough to combine and work together against priestly and plutocratic tyranny.

On the other hand, I am sorry to see Bro. Mitchell make such sweeping assertions as he does in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 3d. In claiming so much for Spiritualism he as fully lays himself open to criticism as did Mr. Herbold. He must not forget that a great many things hav combined to liberalize public sentiment in the last half century. Mr. Mitchell talks as though Infidelity and Spiritualism were two entirely distinct things. I consider that Spiritualists and Materialists are but two separate divisions of the great Freethought or Infidel army. I decidedly object to the use of the phrase "Spiritualist and Liberalists." It would indicate that Spiritualists are not Liberals. To a great extent this is not true, and so such misleading language should be eschewed. You do not hear Materialists make use of this expression. When we say "Freethinkers," "Liberals," we include the whole secular army. Materialists, Spiritualists, Free-Religionists, etc., are simply members of divisions of this army. Bro. Mitchell must not forget that a large proportion of the Spiritualists are not at all interested in practical reforms. They spend their whole time in gaping into cabinets and dreaming of the "Summer Land." Per contra, a great many Materialists as well as Spiritualists are nothing but money-making machines; they do nothing for humanity except what may incidentally result from their idolatrous devotion to self. Now both of these classes are stumbling-blocks in the way of advancing humanity. Bro. Mitchell cannot fail to be aware that the best Spiritualists, those that hav done and are doing the most for social and kindred reforms, are heartily cursed by the great mass of phenomena-loving Spiritualists. Is this not true, my brother in progress? Let us be tolerant and just.

E. C. WALKER.

Reply to the Dodd Card.—Concluded.

NO. III.

Having effectually disposed of the Paine-Adams-Washington part of the card I will now say a few words on the Paine-Ingersoll-Underwood portion. Of the three men thus named thee says, "I do not believe either to be honest," and quotes Underwood as saying "he would not advise any one to believe as he; but he lectured to make money." Now I believe all three to be honest, sincere, and true, and think I hav more good ground for my belief than thee has, judging from the record of the men thee endeavors to malign. In spite of all the clerical falsehoods told about Paine, no one who has read his life and works can believe him dishonest, and while he lived no one dared call him so. He was in fact too honest for his own good, though not for his credit, as will appear yet in the vindication of the ages under the "Consensus of the Competent." As to Underwood, I must hav more proof than the say-so, "one who told thee," that he said he would not advise any one to believe as he, or that he merely lectures to make money. His whole life-record givs the lie to this assertion. He is all the time advising us all to believe precisely as he does. No true, honest lecturer will utter sentiments he does not advise his hearers to believe in. Why, Underwood could make five hundred dollars where he makes one now if he would come right out as a full believer in Christianity, and preach as much for it and the church as he has against it. One genuine recantation of a real Atheistical, non-Spiritualistic Materialist would be worth millions to Christian churches to-day! They hav never known or heard of one, and hav always labored under the disadvantages of being compelled to manufacture cases to suit their purposes.

In view of all this if Underwood really thought his views erroneous or unadvisable he would at once retract them, and "make money" honestly by speaking his true sentiments. No, no, friend Dodd, that story is a little "too thin." And as for Ingersoll charging two hundred dollars a night and taking a dollar from poor men "for blaspheming God and mocking the Savior," it is of a piece with the rest of the tirade.

If a poor man prefers to spend a dollar once in hearing Ingersoll tell a few plain truths and pleasant jokes, and ridicule mythical deities and saviors, to spending forty or fifty dollars a year for pew rent and church dues and missionary purposes, and take it out in hearing dull platitudes, manufactured slanders, and dire denunciations on all natural pleasures and legitimate loves and joys, is he not wise in so doing? It is a shame to defame so good a man as Ingersoll. Why, his whole public record has been one of love, tenderness, and charity. He not long since sent fifty dollars to a poor washerwoman who he heard was getting too old to longer make a living at the wash-tub, and he has actually given away more dollars in one year than your paragon, Jesus Christ, did in his whole life—taking your divinely-inspired volume as a record of his charities. True he pretended to bestow health, restore the blind, heal the leper, and expel devils, but it is very questionable if he really did these things; and even if he did, do we not hear of just as remarkable cures being now performed by "healers" in the Spiritual ranks, or by bits of plaster picked from the walls of a church where some vision sight-seer chances to behold the image of the holy Virgin? The three men thee condemns never manufactured wine for a crowd who were already "well drunken," or advised people to hate father and mother and other relatives and friends; to take no thought for the morrow, but liv off their more industrious neighbors. Nor hav they ever once advised or commanded any person to "believe or be damned," or called people serpents or vipers, or cursed trees because they did not bear fruit out of season. Nor do they call out to hav their enemies brought before them and slain. These things are no trumped-up tales, but are all facts drawn right from the pages of your infallible, holy, and sacred school book. If every vile deed ever done by every Infidel in the world could be penned down in some great record volume of "deeds done in the body," for which account should be given in "the day of judgment" whereof thee warns me to "beware," I would sooner answer for them all than the one heartless, cruel, abominable, and terrible sin that your paragon of Christian perfection committed when he said, "Believe or be damned!" All the countless, innumerable woes, miseries, and sufferings of the billions of trillions of people who hav trod the bosom of old mother earth for millions of years are as nothing to the agony that would be experienced by barely one of those poor wretches whom your savage, vengeful, relentless tyrant of a priest—Jesus Christ—condemned to an eternal and never-ending damnation! We do not judge this Savior of yours by what his enemies hav said about him, but we take your own acknowledged biographical utterances as the basis for our condemnation of him. Nor do we call him names without telling why we do it, as thee did in repeating the words of the New York Observer, calling Paine "worthless, profligate, and unprincipled," as well as blackguard, and giving no reason why. Had the whole train of facts that led to these accusations been related Paine would hav been proved a true hero, a wise man, and a noble, self-sacrificing patriot. It is not with him as it is with your mythical Christ. Thousands who read those accusations and quoted utterances of Paine and Adams hav no means of knowing what called them forth, and so will be falsely deluded into a belief of the unworthiness of Mr. Paine. Whereas, every one has a Bible, and if he has none and is too poor to buy one he can hav the present of one by the asking, and so can read the story of the son of Mary for himself, and see who is right and who is wrong concerning its various statements.

While owning that Thomas Paine was not perfection personified, as you claim your son of God was, we fear not to compare at any time the records of the two men. We Infidels revere the memory of Thomas Paine as one of the world's great human saviors. There was no pretense of kinship to Deity in him. He was essentially and wholly man, but a great, wise, and just man, and he labored for the highest good of his fellow-creatures, and personal comfort and personal aggrandizement he never sought for. Fame and glory were not his object. But to do good was his only and sole aim; and knowing this, it pains us to hear his character traduced and misrepresented age after age by upstarts of theologians, many of whom hav never read a single page of his writings or a line of his true biography. Paine, like Ingersoll and Underwood, was born too soon for his personal comfort. His far-seeing mind reached out into the future and saw truth in all its entirety. He felt that duty called him to giv his prophetic glimpses to the world as a sacred legacy. He knew too well how slander would blacken his honorable name and blast his fair fame, but he said to his conscience:

"I must do nothing, or I must do all;
My thought must act, or it will sting to death.
It must go forth and be a living breath;
Nerve the strong arm and set the brain on fire,
And in the mighty deed full worth acquire."

A Letter from Mr. Gilmore's Christian.

[We always wish to be fair with the Christians, even if they are not with the Infidels, and to that end giv Mr. Walker a chance to be heard. If he does not wish to burn Mr. Gilmore, he is different, probably, from most orthodox church-members, and we congratulate him upon the progress he has made toward Infidelity.—ED. T. S]

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: Not being one of the admirers of your views, politically or ethically, I should not trouble myself to answer what I deem your mere personal errors or opinions, since I am like the good Scotch dame who refused to join in the cry against Infidelity, saying, "If the Lord can stand it I can." But in your issue of April 10th, in an article on Farley, Mr. Gilmore assails me, as I think, unjustly. That I called him honest, truthful, etc., I admit and believe; but when he says I swore, he will, I fear, receive as little credence as when he suggests Christians or others ever swear from inebriety, at least in Iowa, for we hav a prohibition state. That I wished to burn him, etc., is certainly the mere phantom of a disordered mind or, haply, a forecast of dreaded things to come after he shall hav shuffled off this mortal coil. It is possible I wished to pour a little allegorical oil on the raging fire of his overheated imagination and calm the fever of his anti-popery hallucinations; but to touch a hair of his head, or even to hav him leave the town, would be far from my wish, as we would lose an exemplary and hard-working citizen from our little town, and I at least should miss his witty, if sometimes wicked, raillery, which, as a lawyer, and therefore not supposed to hav more than my share of righteousness, amuses me as much, I suppose, as any one, and injures the cause of true faith as little as the barking of a dog at the foot of a tree does the squirrel at the top.

If faith is of God, it will stand, and the attacks of Infidelity cannot prevail against it, and therefore is harmless, unless, as with St. Peter of old, some officious Christians attempt to retaliate and with impious hands presume God's bolts to throw, instead of waiting in Christian faith and charity for God to open their eyes and perhaps take the beams out that blind them too much to the narrow vision of the present. Respectfully,

Farley, Iowa, April 12, 1880. GEORGE E. WALKER.

A Private Letter from L. M. Ticknor, Esq., to Dr. Andrews.

Your card duly read, with its words of cheer and encouragement, thanks; and also for THE TRUTH SEEKER, full of good, rich reading matter; they helped me over Sunday nicely.

It seems to me the paper grows better and better. I note the time is nearly at hand when the "old hero" Bennett is to be let out of prison, to again mingle with his fellows, a free man. I would like to meet him. I wonder what instrument for further torture they will hav ready for him. "The hell-hounds of superstition" hav no idea of letting up; they will follow him like the pack of dogs that they are, sniffing for his very life's blood.

How quickly they would roast him over a "green wood fire" had they the power, and all for "Christ's sake." How long will these things last? How long must the church with her hands stained for ages in the blood of her innocent victims continues to grasp at the throats and throttle the life from out the brightest and best men and women earth has produced? And all under the garb of piety, and in the name of purity. It does seem as if something might be done during the next campaign to right a few at least of these wrongs. Yours truly,

Sterling, Ill., March 12, 1880. L. M. TICKNOR.

The Other Side of the Story.

A few weeks ago we gave copious extracts from Dexter A. Hawkin's anti-Catholic pamphlet showing how that church had robbed the treasuries of this state and city of many millions in the last nine years. The Catholics now retort by publishing a pamphlet giving the Protestant stealings from the same places. The pamphlet also devotes considerable space to answering Clarence Cook's Atlantic Monthly articles.

The compiler of this little exposé finds that there has been given to the various Protestant so-called charities, but really manufactories of Protestant Christians, nineteen pieces of property, worth in the aggregate immense sums.

The "Colored Orphans' Asylum," an institution devoted to the religious care of negro children, received a grant of twenty valuable lots, now worth at least $500,000 dollars, besides drawing from the state and city treasuries per capita allowances for the support of the inmates.

The "Protestant Episcopal Asylum," a strictly denominational institution of the Episcopal church, obtained a practical gift of land on Lexington avenue and Forty-ninth street of twelve lots, worth about $250,000. The city leases it to the church for an annual rental of one dollar.

The "Baptist Ladies' Home," a so called benevolent institution, which demands a fee of $100 before it will admit an indigent old Baptist lady, receives for the same rental (its lease is for ninty-nine years) a tract of land comprising ten lots between Lexington and Fourth avenues worth about $250,000.

The "Chapin Home" is a Universalist benevolent concern which exacts the modest sum of $300 before it will open its doors to poverty-stricken and bed-ridden Universalists. Only about forty or fifty persons are sent to heaven annually on these terms, but the society occupies land worth $200,000 at a rent of $1 per annum. It strikes us that the city could support these persons by boarding them around at less expense than giving them all this land besides paying a per capita allowance.

The House of Refuge on Randall's Island in the East River is also a sectarian concern, run entirely by Protestants and for their benefit. It costs the city about $130,000 a year to run it. Various lots in the city hav been given to this society.

The "Nursery and Child's Hospital" is another "charitable" Protestant institution, which costs the city a little over $100,000 a year to run. The city also gave it a lease at $1 per year of fifteen city lots. The state contributed heavily towards the cost of its buildings.

St. Philip's Church for Colored Persons is a Protestant Episcopal sanctuary in First street. It, of course, pays no taxes. The city conveyed to it, for one dollar, a plot of land 50x200 feet (four city lots) for a burial ground.

The "Church of the Redeemer" is another beneficiary that subsists on the charity of the city, using, during the pleasure of the Common Council, a plot of ground 204x200 feet on Fourth avenue and Eighty-first street, worth at least $100,000.

St. Luke's Hospital is a denominational institution, which provides for the inmates "the ministrations of the gospel agreeably to the doctrines of the Protestant Episcopal church." A "sisterhood" is connected with the church. The Protestant Episcopal service is held daily in the sick wards, thus aggravating, as we should suppose, the diseases of the inmates. Patients receiving treatment, except in cases of sudden accident, are required to pay. The city granted them one of the finest lots of ground in the city (twenty-four lots) for $1 per year.

These are a few of the innumerable instances wherein the city government has voted away solid blocks of land to sectarian parties. The Protestants are no less rapacious and unscrupulous than the Catholics.

This pamphlet argues that if money and land are given to one they should be given to another. But who knows of any leasing of whole blocks to Infidel societies for $1 per year? How much chance would a man hav who should introduce such a resolution into either our Common Council or state Legislature?

Among the vast sums of money drawn from the treasury for the church, though disguised under charitable disguises, are:

To the New York Orphan Asylum, an institution which only indentures children to Protestants, in the past few years, $52,204.51.

The Leake and Watts Orphan House, a Protestant sectarian establishment, $22,975.49.

The Colored Orphan's Asylum, besides the large amount of land, has received $176,157.24.

The Protestant Half Orphan Asylum, $62,389.94.

The Orphans' Home and Asylum of the Protestant Episcopal Church has received a twenty years' lease of the land it occupies, for $1 per year, besides the comfortable amount of $28,000 in cash.

There are twenty-one Protestant sectarian institutions which under the guise of charity draw from $2,000 to $100,000 per annum from the public treasury, eleven reformatories drawing from $1,000 to $10,000 per year, fifteen asylums for adults drawing about the same, and seventeen hospitals, together with several "special" institutions.

The author of this book makes the charge that these institutions "use charity only as an auxiliary to proselytism," a charge easily capable of verification against either the Protestant or Catholic church.

It is an old saying that when rogues fall out honest men get their dues, and so with these two powerful religious bodies. When they get to recriminating each other the Liberals will learn how deep in iniquity they both are sunk. We hope to see the fight go on.

Spiritualism and Materialism.

A somewhat heated, if not acrimonious, discussion has been going on in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the past few weeks. We hav been strictly neutral and entirely impartial in presenting the two sides, printing nearly every letter sent, denying none a hearing that presented their ideas in courteous terms. A few—on both sides—hav exceeded the limits of courtesy, and hav, consequently, been laid aside. We hav on hand several more communications, which will be presented as soon as space will permit.

Some Materialists propose to accept the aid of Spiritualists only as long as necessary to accomplish a certain work and then throw them overboard. We regret to see this spirit; it is too nearly akin to the Protestant style of consolidating to fight their "mother church" and then breaking up into innumerable sects to quarrel and contend with each other. Liberals, whether they believe in a future life or not, hav no cause to wage war upon each other, even though it be in the harmless way of newspaper articles.

We think that all those who believe in freedom; who believe in granting to others the same rights they claim for themselves; who believe that the world will be better and happier by the lifting from its brain of the dead weight of the superstitious creeds and dogmas that hav for so many long years lain upon it; who think that this earth is not a house of detention for souls to prepare to be transported over the river to be shut up forever in a golden prison, with the Almighty for a jailer; who reject the "inspiration" of the "scriptures" and refuse to believe that the ruler of the universe was born of a woman, can work harmoniously, side by side, to bring about the reformation in matters of opinion and liberty of the great mass of the people of this country.

It is true some Spiritualists look with favor on the church, and seek to curry favor with the ministers by loud professions of purity and piety in about equal proportions; but so do some so-called Liberals. We hav seen a truckling on the part of some "Liberals" and Materialists to the Christian church that, were we a Spiritualist, would disgust us most heartily. But both Spiritualists and Materialists are, in the vast majority of instances, opposed to a sham profession, and heartily unite in fighting the enemy so zealously seeking to undermine our constitutional religious privileges; and while doing this there should be no recriminations and pharisaical holding at arm's length on either side. Whatever differences of opinion there may be as to the possibility or desirability of another world, all are agreed that this one can and should be made better. But this cannot be done by the two wings standing apart and throwing moral brickbats at each other. They must come together and join hands. Then can they more unitedly fire on the enemy's works and force him to demand a truce.

Within the last few years there hav been serious encroachments made upon the liberties of the people of the United States by religious bigots, and it seems as though the battle had to be fought by the Liberals and Liberal press of the country. The secular mass, as well as the religious press, seem dead to the issue. Because their liberty is not invaded, because they are not shut up in prison, they look with indifference at the efforts of the Protestant Jesuits and seem to think there is no danger. They regard it as impossible for the church to revive the medieval horrors of her reign, and go to sleep, trusting that things will take care of themselves. So the Liberals are left alone to fight single-handed against an organization that has been centuries in perfecting its machinery of cruelty and power. It needs all the fighting force that can be mustered, and internal differences must be dropped.

There is not such a very wide chasm between the two branches of Freethinkers as some would make out. Both are opposed to tyranny and in favor of liberty. Both religions, if we may call them by such a name, are creedless if not godless; and dogmas are unknown in either. Both believe in making the world better. Both are in favor of education, intelligence, and the diffusion of knowledge. Both are opposed to the maintenance of a non-producing priesthood to liv on the labors of others and build themselves up by keeping the people ignorant. Both are striving to know the true, and if one sees a heaven full of flowers while the other knows only the grave of dissolution, it can be easily reconciled. Both can journey together till they come to the tomb; the rest the future can take care of. Both are opposed to imprisoning men for their opinions, knowing that our thoughts are chainless as the wind and roam withersoever they will. If there is another world the best preparation for it is a life well spent here. In our opinion works are of more importance than faith. Faith in the right, in the true, the good, in the human race, is well enough, but faith in some mythological deity or heaven is not essential to happiness here or hereafter. The Materialist can go along with the Spiritualist till they reach the end. If the one rises the other is pretty sure to. There is no need of worrying over what at the best must remain an unsolved problem to many if not all of us.

A Correction.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 13th appeared a letter from Mr. Trenchard, of Ouray, Col., in which he seemed to charge a Mr. A. F. Kibbe, of Brooklyn, N. Y., with doing several rather immoral things while engaged in Colorado in superintending the erection of mining works. We received a call from Mr. Kibbe the other day in regard to it. He showed us letters from prominent men of both Colorado and Brooklyn, which convinced us that Mr. Trenchard was wrongly informed. Mr. Kibbe is not so pious and therefore not so wicked as stated in the letter of Mr. Trenchard, and we wish to do him no injustice. He appeared to us a straightforward, honest, sober man, and we regret that anything derogatory to his character as such should hav appeared in these columns. He spoke highly of Mr. Trenchard, with whom he stopped for a short time while in Colorado, and expressed himself as entirely unable to see why such a story should hav emanated from him. He thinks some enemy has made use of Mr. Trenchard's name to do injury to both.

Simultaneous Meetings on May 2d.

The friends of a free press, free speech, free mails, whose exemplar and advocate and martyr Mr. Bennett is, very naturally wish to make the demonstration in his behalf on his liberation as widely extended as possible. If it can take a national shape it will hav a grand effect.

While we here, at his home and at the center of affairs, are greeting him personally, if we could know that in a thousand places in the United States and Canada, wherever he has a few friends or where there is a League or other Liberal association who would meet to greet him in spirit and talk over the situation in the interest of freedom, it would hold up our hands here and giv multiplied interest and significance to the occasion. If also the officers of such meetings would send us a telegram, giving a brief but stirring sentiment, and stating the fact of such a meeting at such a place, it would be a very graceful and every way effective thing for the Liberals of this free republic to do. We would like also any longer statement, resolution, or protest that such meetings may choose to make, to be sent us by mail for publication with the proceedings here. The telegraph will practically make us one grand mass convention and indignation meeting all over the land. Our meeting here will be certainly three and probably four hours in session—from eight till nearly twelve o'clock at night. When it is eight here it will be only a little past seven in Chicago and St. Louis. A little attention to the difference of time will bring the telegrams to the New York meeting at the right hour. A few spirited telegrams to be read to the New York audience as received will add to the enthusiasm of the demonstration here and extend its influence.

We hope to see the local Leagues generally meet on that evening and resolve and protest and telegraph us their action. The Leagues and Liberal associations and groups of Liberals everywhere should set aside all the aspersions and scandals against Mr. Bennett, and ignore even his own errors if he has committed any. They hav nothing to do with the fact that his imprisonment is an outrageous invasion of freedom of the press. The dearest principles advocated by the fathers and embedded by them in the foundation of the republic are violated in his imprisonment. It makes him the representative of them all; and, as such, he should be sustained.

Friends in the East, West, North, and South, let us forget not the assembling of ourselves together, and let us hear from you on the evening of the 21 of May.

Full address, Hon. Elizur Wright, President Bennett Reception, Chickering Hall, New York. But probably at most telegraph offices just the brief address, "Elizur Wright, Chickering Hall, New York," will do. We shall hav a special understanding with the offices here for a proper delivery of all messages.

DANIEL E. RYAN,
Chairman Rec. Com.

To the Auxiliary Liberal Leagues.

GREETING: All members and friends of the National Liberal League who favor the progress of secular ideas are invited to attend the Bennett reception on Sunday evening, May 2d, at Chickering Hall, New York City. Those who cannot be present can send telegrams to "Elizur Wright," Chickering Hall."

It is hoped that the true friends of the cause will lay aside all private criticisms and let their voice be heard in favor of humanity and progress on this occasion. It is our common cause, and the enemy that sent Bennett to prison will, if strong enough, soon attack every one of us found differing in opinion or practice from the dogmas or rites of the church. We must by prompt action prevent such religious wars here as hav devastated Europe. Let us hav a rousing greeting from East and West.

A. L. RAWSON,
34 Bond st., New York. Sec. N. L. L.

To the Members and Contributors of the National Defense Association.

FRIENDS: On the evening of Sunday, May 2d, the Bennett reception will be held in Chickering Hall, New York city. We shall welcome the return of the victim of Comstock's vengeance from a modern bastile, where he has been held for eleven months by sectarian hate, aided by unjust laws. Our hands hav been strengthened by money and sympathetic words on all occasions, and funds are now pouring in generously for present use. Let us hav from those who cannot be present telegrams of sympathy and encouragement from all our friends all round the horizon that will light up the sky of church domination, and giv us hope of final success in our secular work.

A. L. RAWSON,
Pres. N. D. A.

The Penalty of Infidelity.

The village of Irwin's Station, Pa., has a Liberal League. Some of the most prominent citizens are members of it. In January, 1879, the League engaged B. F. Underwood, the noted Infidel lecturer, to deliver a series of discourses. The schoolhouse in the village does duty, on all occasions, as a town hall. The League contracted with Dr. McCormick, president of the school board, for the use of the school building during the Underwood lecture course. The lectures were announced in the local papers of the county. The churches took the matter up. On the Sunday previous to the time set for the first appearance of Underwood, all the preachers in Irwin made the lectures their pulpit subject. They denounced by name the parties who had arranged for the Liberal discourses. Influence was brought to bear on the school board, and at a meeting of the board a resolution forbidding the Liberal League opening the schoolhouse for Underwood was passed. Dr. McCormick, the president, refused to annul the contract he had made with the League. Underwood appeared in the village ready to lecture on the day appointed. Dr. McCormick gave the manager of the League an order on the janitor of the schoolhouse for the key to the building. The janitor had previously delivered the key to the high constable of the village. The constable refused to giv it up. At the hour advertised for the lecture five hundred people had assembled about the schoolhouse. A. M. Browser and Mr. Crookston, prominent citizens and members of the League, appeared on the scene and opened the schoolhouse with a crowbar. The room was lighted and the crowd flocked in. Leading representatives of the church were present. Mr. Underwood began his lecture, and was greeted with hoots, cat-calls, and uncomplimentary remarks. The noise was so great and continuous that the lecturer was forced to stop, and the meeting broke up amid the greatest excitement. The next day Messrs. Browser, Crookston, and Underwood were arrested on a charge of forcible entry and detainer and blasphemy. The parties gave bail to appear for trial. That night Underwood succeeded in delivering his lecture on "Science against the Bible."

April 15th the case against Browser, Crookston, and Underwood came up for trial at Greensburg. As it was understood that Anthony Comstock was pushing the prosecution, great interest was taken in the case. Comstock did not enter the court, but was in the neighborhood. Ex-United States Senator Edgar A Cowan appeared for the defense, and H. P. Laird conducted the prosecution. The prosecution claimed damages for injury done to the schoolnouse by breaking into it, and for the "immoral and blasphemous" use to which it had been put. The amount of the damage was placed at $500. The injury done to the building, by the way, was repaired the next day for twenty-five cents. The jury considered the case for half an hour. They then returned with a verdict against the defendants, awarding damages to the amount of $150. The case will doubtless be carried to the Supreme Court.

We copy the above from the New York Sun. We are exceedingly sorry Mr. Underwood has been another victim to Anthony Comstock, and we trust that that scoundrelly individual will be frustrated in his attempts to annoy the lecturer.

The Other Ox.

If revenge is sweet, some of us advanced Liberals owe to the whirligig of time more than we can ever repay for the very honiest of avenging morsels. Indeed we are the conquering party, and the victory is ever ours. Who would ever hav prophesied that within two short years a stalwart ox out of the 'moral" herd would get gored? In one of the challenges leading to the conflict at Syracuse we heard something about taking the bull by the horns. Well, the bull was took, but it turns out uncommonly good for the horns. They are taking on new wrinkles and a wider range of pasture every year. They will soon toss the maiden all forlorn—her very self in all her immaculate "minority of one."

The latest victim of the rising tide seems to be Mr. Abbot's very next friend, whom he pats on all occasions as the model Liberal, able lecturer, and moral man par excellence—yes, and what is more, the husband of Sara, too, she who is such a connoisseur in "beastly passions." Mr. B. F. Underwood has been and gone and got himself arrested, tried, and sentenced, of all crimes in the world, for "blasphemy and immorality."

And that is not all. There's more richness. Crowning sweetening in the whirligig of revenge, Abbot's other next friend, probably his very best next friend, with whom he foregathers and consults and advises, and invites other Liberal editors to meet, consult, and advise, whenever the agent with the smut-bag visits Boston — his other next friend, Comstock, is the man who is skulking around in the neighborhood, but not in the court-house, pushing and urging on the proceedings against Underwood.

But we hav not put our horn spoon down to the depth of the richness yet. Underwood committed his immorality with a crow-bar!

Oh, Underwood! dear Underwood! immorality with a crow-bar! Why, the obscene Bennett never went to such lengths, nor the Freelove Heywood to such depths! Immorality with a crow-bar—and on a school-house, too! Shades of departed pedagogues, look down from your blessed abodes on 25 cents' worth of outrage like this! Hav you no spiritual birch lying immortalzed on some heavenly shelf for such a sacrilege? Dear Underwood, next friend of Abbot, this reduces you to the ranks of Bennett, Heywood, Foote, Lant, and Train! The quintette becomes a sextette by this new arrival! At this rate we shall soon hav enough to make a League—"League of America," for instance.

We are assured there is no mistake about this. A court and jury hav decided it. To break open a school-house with a crow-bar, and deliver such lecture talk as Underwood givs, is immoral and blasphemous to the extent that $150 will make it good. There is no going behind the opinion of the court, Mr. Abbot. It is greatly to his credit, for he himself has said it. It is immoral and blasphemous.

We are not sorry for Underwood; he deserves his fate. He might hav known the potentialities for immorality lying latent in a crow-bar. But poor Abbot has our sympathies. He will be put to the trouble and expense of buying a bundle of private letters from some old girl, and publishing a sweet-scented expose of Underwood. Bundy will hav to reciprocate with five thousand extra copies, and Bennett must be called in to testify to the genuineness of Underwood's private letters. Then the revenge in the whirligig will be complete—yes, absolutely complete, because for immorality with a crow-bar the parallel can go no farther. And no reception in Chickering Hall will be given to Underwood—that is, unless he can redeem himself by some private letters to a young and innocent thing of thirty-five.

Adieu, dear Underwood! We shall never hear your winning voice again. You will hav to pay the fine yourself, and then you will be dead-broke. I would not mind contributing ten cents to lighten the load; but all the rest of the Liberals, belonging, as they do, to the "obscene League," "run by a Freelove ring," it is not likely that a single other Liberal will contribute a cent. The motto among birds of a feather will be "served him right." He had no business to offend Comstock. That settles his fate. Comstock is a good citizen, and his law a wise and necessary statute made and provided by the United States to keep obscene people from mailing "Cupid Yokes," writing private letters, or committing 25 cents' worth of blasphemy with a crow bar on a school-house.

Now, as to our own ox, whom we are going to receive at Chickering Hall, if he were the devil incarnate—the Christian devil—and yet accident or design, or even his own infernally malignant nature, made him a friend of freedom of the press, an advocate of free mails, an exponent of free principles generally, we should get up testimonials to that devil when he comes out of any prison to which he had been consigned as a representative of freedom. We wish there were more such devils, and will take one of his imps in ours every time in preference to a Christian who can't endure the unlimited printing of free ideas, nor the free circulation of them through the mails, and has to go to the United States court to get support for a religion which cannot stand on its own merits in the presence of an argument. None of your gods who say "vengeance is mine" for us. But if by the devil is meant an enemy of the human race, a man of ill-will, a wisher of evil to humanity, then Mr. Bennett is no such man, nor devil, and as a representative of the principles of freedom on which this republic is founded, we honor him and propose to do him honor on his escape from the vengeance which "God" and the little Christians which he made in his own image hav put upon the illustrious martyr.

Now I remember that even Artemas Ward had to write under some of his humorisms, "This is a sarkasm." Mr. Underwood or some of hia friends may need the same designation to my oxide of potassium on him. If he or they do need such assurance. let me add in all dead earnest that the friends of Mr. Bennett and all the "repeal" or "advanced" or "Freelove" or however designated Liberals will rally around Mr. Underwood, or even around Mr. Abbot, when his turn comes, as they hav around Mr. Bennett in the trials he has had to undergo. Persecution makes the whole Liberal world kin; and TRUTH SEEKER readers know no creeds, nor stripes, nor shades of Liberalism. T. C. L.

Charles Bradlaugh, M.P.

Charles Bradlaugh has been elected to Parliament, and this is what he has to say concerning the efforts made by the church to prevent it. We congratulate Mr. Bradlaugh on his success. The English government will hav at least one able man in it:

AFTER THE BATTLE.

A twelve years' fight, three repulses, and at last victory. The concluding week's contest was fairly sharp; religious prejudices were excited to the utmost. The clergy preached against us, cela va sans dire. A wretched specimen of the worst kind of town missionary, who is sometimes employed in libelling Roman Catholics, devoted himself conjointly and in very temporary harmony with the chief Roman Catholic clergymen of Northampton to the still more congenial task of striving to libel ourselves. A pious coach-builder person—who is now the peculiar patron of two Liverpool missionaries, who, when one of them is not in jail for his virtues, are employed in extending ultra-Protestant influences throughout the provinces—was specially active. The name of the pious coach-builder is Mulliner; he livs at present in Liverpool, but he has taken the liveliest interest in the Northampton election. He printed at least 10,000 addresses to the electors, window-bill size, and also issued a few hundreds of grander dimensions, in which he duly denounced the wicked and blasphemous Bradlaugh. On Thursday morning 8,000 of Mulliner's previous productions were sent by post, one to each of the electors. If at his own charge, this postage alone must hav cost the good Mulliner no less than £34, without reckoning the price of envelopes and the clerks' charges for addressing each envelope. We know that this was not done by the Conservative candidates or with their knowledge, as we hav received the positive assurance of Mr. Merewether to that effect, and we know that all Tories who hav been in Parliament are utterly incapable of misrepresenting a matter of fact. It was all pure labor of love on the part of the loving and good but afflicted and in-the-fire-tried Mulliner. And yet, alas, so much printers' ink and paper wasted! so many bill-posters' energies utterly thrown away! Eight thousand postage stamps entirely and irretrievably gone! The good Mulliner can now, discontented with the wickedness of the world in general and of Northampton in particular, go back to the pure and soul-inspiriting trade of coach-building, resolving in future that even in the manufacture of coach wheels he will allow no more than one knave to be concerned.

Outlines of Phrenology.

We would call the attention of our readers to the advertisement in another column of our new work on Phrenology. We are sure our readers will like its descriptions of the moral sentiments. It shows as fully as possible in the space at command that there are no religious faculties or sentiments in the human mind; that religion and worship depend entirely on the creed that may be held and indorsed by the intellect, and that without such creed there is no religion, but simply morality. In fact, this little work is calculated to create a revolution in Phrenology so far as its so-called "religious sentiments" are concerned, and really merits a large sale. We hope every one of our readers will order a copy.

We desire to call the attention of phrenologists to our new work on Phrenology advertised elsewhere. It will be found to be just the thing for them to use as a chart. Its true tables, its rules for health and self-improvement, its clear and concise way of stating things, and its general appearance, all combine to make it an excellent and popular work. It is already being spoken of in the highest terms by those who hav seen it, and needs but to be seen to be appreciated. Send for a specimen copy.

A Few Words in Reply to A. Chenoweth's Article on D. M. Bennett.

In last week's Review appeared an article over A. Chenoweth's signature, on the subject of D. M. Bennett's imprisonment, which shows much wilful misrspresentation or else an utter ignorance of the facts in the case. I will be charitable enough to suppose the latter to be the case.

Having read both sides of this Bennett affair from the beginning, I will state the matter as I understand it.

Mr. Bennett's only offense before the law was sending through the mails to purchasers a pamphlet entitled "Cupid's Yokes," which is a treatise criticising the present marriage system, and containing some plain expressions on sexual matters, but no more obscene than hundreds of medical books in common use.

Its author, E. H. Heywood, was imprisoned by some fanatics in Massachusetts, but when the book was brought to the notice of Attorney-General Devens he pronounced it not obscene, and Mr. Heywood was promptly pardoned by President Hayes.

After Heywood was pardoned Mr. Bennett sold the pamphlet, the same as other books in his business. And when Anthony Comstock, actuated by personal spite, secured his arrest and sentence before a bigoted judge, it was confidently and reasonably expected that the President would interfere and prevent the execution of the unjust sentence; and he doubtless would hav done so had it not been for the influence brought to bear by the clergy.

Mr. Bennett was publishing a paper that was dealing sturdy blows to superstition, and when the priesthood discovered their enemy down, they all jumped upon him. The howl of "obscene literature" was rolled forth by the religious papers; it was thundered from every pulpit, and hundreds of laymen took up the echo, of which Mr. Chenoweth's is a fair sample.

By working through the influence of Mrs. Hayes the President was induced to allow Mr. Bennett to serve out his unjust sentence; and we hav the spectacle of a man imprisoned, not because he had committed any crime, but because he is an active worker against the intolerant religion that seeks to rule the land.

To compare Mr. Bennett to a horse-thief, or to say he robbed the youth of their chastity, is utterly unjust. I don't think any honest, intelligent person can read "Cupid's Yokes" and say it contains any intention of obscenity, or that it would be likely to "rob the youth of their chastity."

I hav a copy of the work in my possession, and make the following proposition as a challenge to Mr. Chenoweth (or any one else who thinks Mr. Bennett is justly imprisoned) He may select the worst passages he can find in the book, and I will take the literature he keeps in his family for daily reading (not medical works) and find in it worse obscenity than can be found in the books for the mailing of which Mr. Bennett is imprisoned and so much abused.

I hope the abusers of Mr. Bennett will accept this challenge, or else stop their ceaseless cry of "obscenity."

But because Mr. Chenoweth keeps such literature in his family, I will not be so intolerant and unjust as to accuse him of wishing to rob his children of their chastity, for I don't think he has any such intention. No more did Mr. Bennett intend to rob any of their chastity. He simply believed that every person in this free country had a right to express his honest opinion on any subject. In striving to maintain that right he fell a victim to the same religious intolerance which two centuries ago, when it had the power, used to burn men at the stake. D. R. SEYMOUR.

The Evils of Medical Legislation.

ABSTRACT OF AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE MANHATTAN LIBERAL CLUB, APRIL 9, 1880.

BY R. A. GUNN, M.D.

In order to discuss this question properly, in all its bearings, Dr. Gunn said: It is necessary to review so much of the healing art that relates to the position which the members of that profession hav held with regard to every new discovery.

The early practice of medicine consisted of mere empiricism, and very ignorant empiricism at that. Toads, snakes, lizards, and such like were the agents employed by the "Regulars" of that time. They believed in all forms of sorcery, in methods for frightening away the demons of disease, and in this consisted the regular practice of medicine.

The first great quack of whom we hav any definite record is Paracelsus. He was the first to introduce mercury; he was denounced, and then his quicksilver, or quacksilver, was adopted by the profession. From that day to this, every person who has dared to differ from "the Regulars" with regard to the use of medicine, or even called the notice of the profession to a scientific fact, has been denounced as a humbug. So with Harvey; he was denounced most violently for having directed the attention of the profession to a scientific explanation of the circulation of the blood.

So with Jenner, who, by the way, was not really the discoverer of vaccination, although he claimed to be so; and now the person who dares to question the benefits of vaccination is hooted at for his ignorance. Such also was the experience of Hahnemann, the father of Homeopathy.

The three distinctive schools of medicine are the Allopathic, Homeopathic, and Eclectic; and these are as intolerant and bigoted in their opinions to-day as the members of the old orthodox church are in theirs. There was a time, however, when the majority of people actually believed that the cure of disease ought not to be attempted outside of these. After a while people began to see that there was a Hydropathic system of practice, and that many beneficial results had been obtained from it; then Electricity was found to be valuable, and it was believed that there was no necessity for medicine at all. Then again we had Magnetic physicians; and no person who is a close observer of the effect of manipulations, whether it is simply by rubbing, or by the influence of one mind over another, can fail to notice that very beneficial results hav followed the hand of the manipulator, especially in nervous diseases.

Then we had the Clairvoyants, who declare that they are capable of diagnosing for a disease. Then there was another class, the natural bone-setters; take one instance, the Sweet family, how it has not unfrequently happened that members of this family hav set dislocated bones when the best surgeons hav failed.

Dr. Gunn then proceeded to call attention to the fact that though "the Regulars" denounced with unsparing vigor, and had sought, and were even now seeking, legislation to force the people to accept them and their doctrines, yet it was perfectly clear to every reflective mind that the whole system of the action of remedies was experimental. Many persons can take half a drach of opium without it having any effect; that is, so far as life is concerned; and the dose of medicine that will cure one will poison another. Thus it is through the whole history of Therapeutics.

The speaker read a number of notes from Dr. Jacob Bigelow, President of the Massachusetts Medical Society, from Oliver Wendell Holmes, Sir William Hamilton, and the eminent Pathologist, M. Biche, in confirmation of the correctness of his position, and then alluded to the case of Charles O'Conor, who some time ago was very sick, given up by the doctors; finally, when the doctors gave him up, he made up his mind to giv up the doctors. Report has it that he called in a Magnetic physician. The result is, he is alive and well to-day in spite of the physicians who said that it was utterly impossible for him to liv.

There is another thing, said Dr. Gunn, to which I desire to call your attention, and that is, that the discoverers of nearly all the valuable remedies hav been ostracized from the profession for their heretical belief.

Dr. Rush, of Philadelphia, who was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, in speaking to his class, said: "Remember how many of our most useful remedies hav been discovered by quacks. In the present state of medical knowledge, let me advise you to converse with nurses and old women. Nearly every medicine has become a popular remedy before being adopted by physicians."

Now, what are the aims of this medical legislation? The aim has been from the first to create a privileged class in medicine. The same persons are anxious to create a state church. They further aim to prevent all efforts to educate the people.

Who are at the bottom of this legislation? As a rule, the professors of our medical colleges—the men who hav sent our friend Bennett to prison for a year for expressing his opinion; and these would also prosecute us for expressing our opinion on any subject, medical or religious. These persons prosecuted Dr. Foote because he was an "irregular" physician. Orthodoxy, whether in medicine or in religion, is of necessity intolerant.

The evils of medical legislation were shown by citations from the laws of Massachusetts, Michigan, California, Illinois, and New York.

Dr. Gunn closed his address by saying that though a graduate from a "regular" college, he was most unalterably opposed to any legislative interference whatever. If any person believed in any other mode of treatment than that advocated by himself, he had an unquestioned right to obtain it; he asked for equal liberty for all, and, for his own part, he desired no privilege he was not willing to concede to others.

Reply to Dr. T. R. Kinget.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please giv space for a friendly chat with the Doctor. We love discussion when all concerned can keep cool and treat each other with courtesy and due respect for honest difference of opinion. That respect has been maintained thus far with all who hav taken part in the recent discussion concerning soul and future life, except our friend Herbold, who seemed to fly off at a tangent. We are sorry he was loaded with such hot, hasty ammunition, but then he livs down in a warmer climate, where they will get hasty sometimes.

Now, Doctor, if you will read my article in the issue of March 20th carefully you will find I did not say I knew the soul has been and always will be a living independent entity. I said I believe that each atom contains an unevolved immortal principle, or soul, which always has existed and always will exist, hence, according to this belief, I meant the life principle or soul always has been and always will be an independent entity. He asks to reconcile the two opinions of "soul being an independent entity," and yet "we can not conceive of intelligence entirely independent of organization." I do not see anything to reconcile. I claim that when the life or soul which now animates this physical body of mine was in the atom, that the atom was an independent organization, and that the soul has traveled up through the mineral and vegetable kingdoms and through the lower animal, but that it was never independent of organization, and maintained its entity the entire distance. He asks, "Is soul one thing and intelligence another?" and says that Materialists deny that either is a thing, a living entity; and calls on me for proof. I believe—I don't know—that soul, intellect, mind, are one and the same thing, and that it is a thing, an entity. If I had said I knew this to be so then the Doctor would hav had a right to ask me to prove how I knew it; but he can not expect me to prove what I hav just given as my opinion. But I shall endeavor to back it up with the best I hav in the shop. I am here; it is an axiom; and I believe I hav reached my present stage of development as I hav stated above, but I freely admit I am not conscious of my atomic mineral, vegetable, protoplasmic, fish, reptile, bird, or quadruped life, yet I believe I was there, and not being conscious of it does not prove I was not. The Doctor's body was once undergoing fœtal development; does he remember it? Is he conscious of it? He was there all the same. He was born once (I think he has not been born again); does he remember it? He was there, no doubt. He was once a child six, then twelve, then twenty-four, then thirty-six months old; is he conscious of it? According to his reasoning he was not there if he is not conscious of it. Come, Doctor, how is it, were you there when you were born? You see that not being cognizant of it does not prove you were not there; neither does it prove that you did not travel up through different kingdoms and various organisms simply because you are not conscious of it.

I believe the soul is capable of unfoldment, like the blooming rose, and in its upward flight it takes on still finer and finer organisms, by which it may be able to still further unfold; and in accordance with progression's law it can never take on a grosser condition, as that would be retrogradation. Hence I say that when we throw off this gross physical body we will still be incased in a finer physical body, and just as tangible in the next sphere of life as our gross physical body is here.

He says of the hickory-nut that when we remove the outside and inside shells the germ dies, and he says, "Likewise of the soul, if it ever had an existence, in the proper sense of the term." I grant it of the hickory-nut, but he should remember I hav not supposed the finer shell or body is going to be taken from off the soul. True, I do not know anything of the physiology or pathology of this finer body, but that does not disprove its existence. A good many things exist which the Doctor knows nothing of.

I say yes, the life principle or soul is material. I can not conceive of anything being immaterial.

The Doctor livs, has life; is it something or nothing? Yes, we say the spirit body is finer than the physical body, and that it, too, is subject to change. Change is a decree of nature. We claim the soul changes, unfolds, will not be the same to-morrow it is to-day, but it will not lose its identity by unfoldment. Take the full-blown rose; it is not the physical part that we smell; pluck it off, throw it upon the ground until it withers and fades, then it has no sweet smell. Change has taken place; the aroma (the soul, if you please) has left. Can you say it has become annihilated? Will it ever turn into the poisonous smell of the upastree? or will it remain the aroma of the rose forever?

I believe that all matter is progressive in its tendency—becoming finer and finer; and when all the gross matter of this planet shall hav reached the finer—that quality called spirit—there will be no gross matter below it to be cut off, as the Doctor speaks of.

The Doctor says the lower supply the higher modes or forms of being, and the higher return to supply the lower. Now, Doctor, are you not considerably lame on this point? Go back to the time when life first manifested itself on this planet and please tell us where there were any higher to return to supply the lower. Better back down from that position, Doctor, as quietly as possible.

Again, he says, "If the spirit and soul of Franklin, according to natural law, having suffered change, he has lost his identity and taken up his abode in the grosser organism of an oyster, he must work his way up until he again takes the highest honors in the gift of nature." It seems from this latter clause the Doctor has mistaken my idea and has supposed what I claim not a supposable case. I hav fought retrogradation all the way through, and claim that the soul of Franklin and all others hav always had an unconscious entity until the genus homo was reached, and that they will ever after remain an independent entity incased in a much finer physical body than in this sphere of life. I claim the soul takes on organisms suitable for its further development, and it would be just as impossible for the soul of Franklin to get into the organism of an oyster as it would be for the full fledged chicken to get back into the egg.

I hav noticed most of the points in the Doctor's article, and will now assume the aggressive and giv him some Materialistic nuts to crack. Now, Doctor, when you get this, pull your hat down over your eyes, elevate your feet on the back of a chair, get your cigar (if you are a smoker), and please crack these nuts and giv me the benefit of them.

Materialists say that life is the result of organization, and we often hav the tallow-candle brought up as a proof of their theory. They say, there is the wick and tallow, and apply the match and we hav a light; and when the organization is gone, good-bye light, and they say so it is with life when the body dies. I consider this the thinnest reasoning we ever heard from wise heads, but then I suppose it is better than nothing. The difference is simply this, a person is not a candle, and when the gross physical body is laid off there is yet a finer body for the man to liv in, so you see he is not without an organism, so we can't say good-bye to him as we do to the light, because the organization is not gone, like the tallow and wick. You see there is no comparison at all, and we are surprised at Materialists using it as such. Again, if life is the result of organization then organization is the cause of life and motion, consequently there must be a physical human organism before there can be any life. Now let us see what the facts are. It is a demonstrated fact that the male sperm contains life. The motions of the monad are clearly seen in lukewarm water with a small microscope. This is positive proof that the male transmits the life and the female furnishes the receptacle, and that there is life before there is any human organization, and at the moment of conception the life or soul of the future individual commences to take on a physical human organization.

If this be not true will you please tell me when the life enters the human organism. It is well known that there is life and motion at four and a half months' fœtal development. Thus you see there is life with but a partial organization. Please tell me, Doctor, at what time before that does the life enter the partially-developed organism, and the manner of its entering therein, and how life comes to exist there according to the Materialistic idea. It is said that the globules in the iron ore do not lose their identity in undergoing all the various changes all the way up to the hardest steel. I believe if I could make a globule of water as it falls in the rain-drop, I could trace it into the rivulet, the stream, the river, and into old ocean, and find it would retain its identity. So I claim of the human soul, that it has traveled up through everything below us, all the time retaining its identity, and ever will.

I hav met many doctors who do not believe in a soul or future life. Some of them say they can't see the soul when they dissect the body. I say the soul is not there then, and it could not be seen if it was. Might as well say there is no life in an egg, because it can't be seen. As I said before, you cannot reason immortality out, nor the Christian reason it in. It can be known only by positive demonstration. I hav had the evidence, and hav presented my ideas upon the theory of life beyond the grave, and hav tried to show the false reasoning of Materialists. I say life existed before the human organization, and will exist, a conscious entity, beyond the grave. Can you disprove it?

From Facts and Surroundings Man Draws Conclusions.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: From the fact that the earth turns upon her axis once in twenty-four hours we draw the conclusion that she always did. From the fact that matter cannot be annihilated we draw the conclusion that it is eternal in its duration. From the fact that forms of matter are continually changing we draw the conclusion that matter always was, and always will be, subject to change. From the fact of these changes in matter we draw the conclusion that there is a power in matter that produces these changes. These facts are daily before the eye of observation, and are undeniable.

That which is seen to-day may not be seen to-morrow, yet it is not annihilated, but the form is changed. To-day we see cords of wood and piles of coal, to morrow ashes and cinders. To-day we see the forest in all its glory, to-morrow we see cities with church spires reaching toward heaven, and the next day, lo, a wilderness covers the spot, and the ruins thereof under ground. To-day living insects are seen that cannot be numbered, around which cells and shells are formed. Lo, a solid mass of the beautiful marble rock is the result. Change is the history of matter, reaching back to ages beyond count. Yet all things exist in accordance with their nature, from the elephant to the gnat, and change is the destiny of all existing things. Here arises one of the most important questions known to man—Whence this power, force, or law that governs and controls the universe of worlds and planets giving life and form from the largest globe or planet to the smallest animalcule. This brings us square in front of the question. Is this power vested in an individual personage called God, who had an existence before and independent of matter? This idea had its rise and origin in the infancy, or childhood of man, produced as follows: Man's surroundings giv rise to thoughts. Thoughts giv rise to conjectures, and conclusions are the result. Some claim conclusions based upon facts must be correct. Others say no. In the absence of scientific experience man's conclusions are not to be trusted, as can be seen in reference to the existence, locality, and shape of the ear h. The surroundings of man during the early age of development in the absence of science and experience, his conclusions were wild and incorrect. From all the facts and the surroundings in those days, his conclusions were that the earth was flat, and stood upon a foundation, and the pillars went clear down. And from the fact of the sun and moon appearing and disappearing, his conclusions were that they were moving bodies around the earth, which confirmed the idea that the earth was flat and stationary, and the sun and moon passed around it as a center. This was man's belief, and justly, too, for thousands of years.

From facts and conclusions a belief in a personal creator was a natural result. Reasoning back from effect to cause there must be a great first cause, or the universe could not exist, and the same reasoning is yet used; and as man was the highest type of intelligence known, the maker of the universe must be similar to man, the greater possessing all the passions and attributes known to man. This gave rise to the idea that man was made in the image and likeness of his maker, and it is an undeniable fact that the ancients, when writing, referred to him as one of themselves, though more mighty and great, and by some was called God Almighty. It was also a belief that he being a male had connection with women, and sons were born whose generation were giants, and others were saviors. Gods incarnate, born of women, thus made flesh, and dwelt among men, and were worshiped as gods before and after their death. History givs an account of some fifteen or twenty whose followers and worshipers number thousands and millions. As for numbers, the worshipers of Buddah far exceed all others.

Thus a belief in a personal man-god creator became, as it were, an established fact, together with the earth standing upon a foundation, with a flat surface extending to its four corners.

Rev. Swing, of Chicago, proves a personal creator from the fact that he, God, holds the same relation to the universe that a watch-maker holds to a watch; while Rev. Haden, of Abington College, Illinois, claims that the knowledge of a personal creator is tradition from Adam, the first man that God made (of course Adam knew who made him, for he was there).

History informs us that nations differed widely as to their origin and objects of worship. From the fact that everything the sun shown upon sent forth life and vigor, their conclusions were that it was an intelligent being, and was extensively worshiped. Many like questions, as well as a personal creator and ruler of the universe, yet remain to be settled by scientific facts and experiments, the same as it was in reference to the position of the earth, sun, moon, planetary system, and age of the earth. It is now an undeniable fact that the earth has no foundation upon which to stand, but swings out in open space, sustained and controlled by a power, force, or law within and around itself; and the same with all the planets forming the universe, all in motion and active in their spheres, adapted to natural law, so unchangeable that man can make a mathematical calculation hundreds of years ahead, and never miss. These scientific discoveries, now universally admitted to be truths throughout civilization, were opposed by priest and people as false and blasphemous against God, and the discoverers denounced as Infidels of the blackest dye.

We ask, Is it any more unreasonable that the universe has no beginning than for the earth to hav no foundation, or for the earth to pass around the sun instead? Should we trace back upon the line from effect to cause based upon a personal creator and ruler of the universe as described in the Jewish history, we will run into total darkness (one of the darkest kinds of a dark circle), from the fact that the first act on the part of this personal God was to make light. Previous to this act it was densely dark, when he commenced to fix up this earth a few thousand years ago, according to Jewish history. Should we take Rev. Swing's theory, that every existing thing requires a maker, the same as a watch? If God is possessed of an organized form, in the full sense of a person, he is a thing in existence and requires a maker, as it is a scientific fact, an organized form cannot exist in the absence of a power to produce it. It would be an effect without a cause. In our English language, wisdom, truth, and life are sometimes illustrated as persons, in the same sense as the tree of knowledge, the tree of life, and the tree of liberty, but, in fact, not a person or a tree.

It is an undeniable fact that there is a power, force, or law in matter which governs and controls the universe. Should we call this power force or law? God we dispense with, and all personages as described in the different histories, such as Brahma, Buddha, Jehovah, and many other smaller fry, and lose sight of all organized forms having no necessity for one, the same as the foundation of the earth has no use for one. With this view we hav an almighty power everywhere present at the same moment, filling the immensity of space, infinite in the full sense of the word. In all, through all, by which all things exist, and by which the universe is controlled, from a grain of sand to the largest planet known. This brings us to the bottom of this personal-God question. As it is an admitted fact that there is an unseen and unlimited power that rules and governs all matter, the only point to decide is, is this power vested in a person such as is described in the Bible, and who holds this ruling power independent and before matter existed? Is this ruling power inseparable in matter, co-existent, and eternal in union—in relation the same as moisture in water, heat in fire?

As for the common theological view of a personal God, it destroys all the natural sympathies of a loving father by claiming that God took Adam and Eve, the only children he had, and put them into a garden where they were exposed to the ravages of a great he-devil running loose, and left them without protection. In this he is made lower in the scale of fatherhood than animals, for they will protect their young when in danger. We now place this interesting question in the hands of the advocates of a personal, designing God, to show that the power that rules is supernatural in its operations, acting outside and independent of matter, overruling the natural causes of events as his good pleasure may dictate in answer to the prayers of his worshipers (and what are prayers if not answered?). To hav a prayer answered is a fair and honorable request at the hands of those who claim that their God is a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God, more ready to giv to those who ask him than earthly parents are to giv to their children. Making such claims, and then refusing to test them, proves they hav not as much honest faith in their God as the Baalites. They had honesty enough mixed with their faith to test their God, but our Christian brethren claim that it would insult their God to ask him to answer a special prayer when the object is the conversion of honest skeptics, of which I am one. Such an excuse is an insult upon humanity and common sense. A God that desires that all men should be saved, and considers himself insulted when asked to answer a prayer which would, if answered, carry out his own desires in reclaiming more sinners in one week than all the preaching can or will in seven years. It is claimed that he answered a direct prayer when the death of four hundred honest Baalites was the result. Also the slaughter of an army whose offense was defending their country, their homes, their wives, and their children. After refusing to test the supernatural power of God, they will say that you must hav faith in God and believe. If it was possible a man could screw up his imagination to believe without evidence, all would be in good keeping.

Dear reader, from the premises before us we draw the conclusion that the power that rules the universe is in matter, giving form and life corresponding with soil, climate, and surroundings, as every island and continent givs evidence. The operation of this spirit power (I can giv it no better name) is no respecter of persons or things. All vegetable and animal life are equally benefited by the falling rain, the air that floats, the heat that warms, and the light that luminates. On the other hand, all vegetable and animal life are equally subjected to the dangerous action of the existing elements. Fire, water, wind, steam, and disease all fare alike. The priest and the people, the house of worship and the house of ill-fame, the saint and the sinner, the rich and the poor, the church-member and the Infidel. The same with the horse and the elephant, the cow and the bear, the wolf and the lamb. If the power that is in each one is not able and sufficient to check and ward off the ravages of these elements, all fare alike (no exceptions against spirit guardianship). This theory denies the existence of a supernatural power going from house to house killing children with whooping-cough, measles, smallpox, and other diseases called the providences of God; also, the burning of cities, ingulfing of countries and the inhabitants by volcanoes; likewise the destruction of life and property by wind and hail on sea and land, and the instigations of wars and contentions between nations and individuals.

What is the theory of a personal God who existed before and independent of matter, seated upon a throne above the stars, holding the control over all the existing elements and laws that govern, having created them as his servants to do his bidding? If this be true he is responsible for all that takes place throughout the universe. All deaths, except from old age, are acts of providence, and are so preached at funerals, and it is consistent with the idea of a personal, designing God, the creator, who rules and holds all power subject to his will. Thus he permits destruction upon land and sea by the elements, which are his servants and do his bidding. He also permits violation of justice between man and man, having power and opportunity to prevent, but does not. No advocate of a personal, designing God is justified in finding fault with the result of his (God's) management; yet they do, and here is their excuse: There is a personal devil, whose power is equal with God. He got the advantage of God through Adam, and he and God hav been ever since contending for the mastery over man, and for the last six thousand years the devil has been a little ahead; and here is where the trouble lies. This devil gets more help from man to carry on his devilment than God does to carry on religious ceremonies—the only thing that can save; and the world is full of wickedness, and their God Almighty, who holds all power subject to his will, can't help himself. Conclusions end here.

ISAAC PADEN.

Conditional Immortality.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With your many other readers, I hav been much interested in the expression of your correspondents, pro and con, on the subject of immortality. As an investigator, through my life experience I hav learned to be somewhat chary in expressing a positive belief in any direction. I can only say to-day this looks so and so; to-morrow it may be the opposite. I will hold no opinion so firmly but that I am ready at any time to relinquish it for a better. This position is only an acknowledgment that I am neither pope, God, nor the latter's delegated vicegerent in a priestly or ministerial way, but simply a human being, liable with all others to err, and affirming only the one thing—that I will honestly strive for the highest light on any and all subjects I can comprehend with the simplicity and humility of the child at school, being always ready to learn of the new.

On the subject more recently made prominent in your columns, I am inclined to an acceptance of a mean between the two extremes, in a view of immortality as a conditional thing. I am generally known as a Spiritualist, yet to the average Spiritualist there can scarcely be a greater heresy than the denial of immortality to anything human; and the promulgation of views different from the accepted code is among Spiritualists, as among Christians, a matter of more labor than progress, more hostile encounter than pleasurable elucidation of truth. As a class, Spiritualists, like other average humanity, hav a tendency to fossilize around the one idea, and not to grapple with all truth in relation to which that one idea is but an incident. Having proved human existence after death, they jump at once to the conclusion that, having survived its shock, it is continuously eternal, and also that if one is immortal all must necessarily be.

It has seemed to me that it would be more in accordance with reason, on the proof of man's existence in any form after death, to determine by what law or through what power this phenomena has occurred, and by so getting at causes we might the more readily get at the probability of this being an experience common to all humanity, and, once entered on, as one which will remain; otherwise this immortality might be exceptional; another death might occur some time, the result of which would be a final disintegration, and the subject of it would, as an individualized being, never more be known.

To the thinker there is constantly going on before him a startling phenomenon in the abortion of life usually called death. By this we do not mean the surrendering of the physical after it has subserved its purpose, and the real man passes out in the ripeness of old age into that, to us, invisible life, yet the real life, which nature has, through beautifully-ordered laws, arranged; but we mean those instances where the man is rudely torn from the physical before the allotted time by disease or even by accident. The question comes up, if the man could not resist disease so as to retain his body and its legitimate uses for the allotted time, what evidence hav we that his individuality will survive the shock of death? or if it does, that being weakened through the infraction of law, he may not, in consequence, sooner or later, go down and be known as a unit no more?

In a well-ordered old age the individual retains his faculties to the last; death can scarcely be called a struggle, and he passes, as in a slumber, easily and peacefully to that existence which lies immediately beyond this rudimentary one. There are many instances, however, where, notwithstanding the average endurance of the physical, the mental is impaired; so that the childishness of age is perhaps not the exception but the rule. It is said that the brain, as the organ through which the mind or intelligence expresses itself, is worn and injured with the wear and tear of life, and that this is the cause of premature mental decay. Allowing it to be so, what proof hav we, in cases which we can identify, that the survival of death replaces that weakness and decay with mental vigor and strength? When utter imbecility characterizes old age, where is the once vigorous mind? Is it dormant, or is it really dead? If the latter, by what power can it ever again be resurrected and connect itself in working shape with what it has once been?

It is plainly to be observed by the student of nature's laws that there are certain forces in constant operation in the phenomena of life whose office is to destroy, to disintegrate, to make disease and death. On the other hand we find the operation of a set of wonderful and benignant laws, the obedience to which insures the accumulation of life, force, health, and harmony. If immortality is the order of nature will not the obedience to natural law thus insure it, and the violation of the same prevent such a heritage? And is not this added and continued life thus dependent on our knowledge of and obedience to physiological and psychical law?

The Spiritualist, who is also the thinker and the truth seeker, will analyze each case of spirit identity with which he meets, and find what he can bearing on this question. After determining on the things which make up the destroying agent in human existence, he will apply these, as connected with individuals here, with what he can learn of or from them as spirits.

These are facts in connection with spirit manifestation which we will do well to study. The many at all circles who wish to manifest compared with those who do so; the many friends who pass over of whom we hear nothing in any possible way; the complaint of spirits, made such prematurely through disease or otherwise, of weakness and pain on returning, and the invariable accompaniment of the diseased symptoms which immediately preceded their dissolution; the vigor and harmony attending the manifestation of spirits whose lives were obedient to natural law, and whose advent in the life beyond was the ripening of mature age; the peculiar nature of infantile and child life there; the entire absence of any moral standard, as given us in existent moral codes, in its effect on the powers and abilities of the spirit to compass its return, or, so far as we can learn, render it able to continue its existence.

But it is impossible in an article like this to evolve more than a few of the points bearing on this theme, or to elucidate those hidden laws which govern these. What has been said is sufficient to arouse thought on the subject and to incite investigation. Neither the intelligent Spiritualist nor Materialist will believe else than that which he knows, and that which is not proved will do for contemplation, but not for a rule of action. As far as opinion is concerned, there appears to be as great diversity in the life beyond as exists here between Materialist and Spiritualist. It is said that Leonidas, of Spartan fame, is a leader in this school of thought, associated with Socrates and other ancients. He is largely supported, as far as appearances determine, by minds who, in earth life, were physicians, their interest being based in physiological law. Opposed are those once leaders in theological lore with minds who here had that bias.

Be the truth what it may, there is no doubt but that in the near future the question of conditional immortality will be one which thinkers will vigorously grapple; and as new facts and principles are unfolded from the experience of those gone before us, the subject will aggregate to itself new light and a greatly added interest.

Letters from Friends.

FORT SCOTT, KAN.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: At the suggestion of a mutual friend I write you to propose, through your very valuable and interesting publication, that by all who love liberty preparations be made to receive D. M. Bennett, on his liberation from his Christian bastile, with as much show of respect as Gen. Grant has received, or any other man worthy of respect who is a citizen of this country or has visited it. "Honor to whom honor is due!" and if there is any good in liberty or Liberalism, there is honor in him who advocates it, whatever may be his faults or imperfections.

The same government that has spent thousands of dollars of the people's money in extending courtesies to those who had no interest in its welfare has confined in a prison one whose whole interest is in his country, who was laboring to sustain it by advocating the fundamental principles upon which the government was founded. Degeneracy, or a non-appreciation of those principles, has made him a victim of religious bigotry, and now is the time for every lover of honesty, virtue, and liberty to share his love for them by giving D. M. Bennett a grand reception on his liberation. He is but a man, and his faults may be many; but his precepts are good, and he was a bold and able advocate of them.

The five thousand extra copies of the Index sent to that many non-subscribers to defame his character will result in so many fingers of scorn being pointed at one who professed to be and was considered a friend to liberty.

The probability is that there is not one in the whole "caboodle" of D. M. Bennett's enemies or defamers, from the President and wife down to the court and clergy, who would not risk one eye through a keyhole on an obscene picture, or go into some hay-mow to read a more indecent publication than "Cupid's Yokes." That class of people should be vaccinated with something that would destroy the susceptibility or fear of their being contaminated or injured by the truth being taught them or their children.

I wish I could suffer vicariously for Mr. Bennett, so that he could hav half a chance to fight his own and liberty's battles. In my mind's eye I think I can now see his defamers slinking away into their holes of perfidy.

Booms are in order. Who will start the boom to giv the grand old hero a reception worthy of all there is in justice and liberty?

As a general thing you will find that those who know they are robed in scarlet are expecting and taught to believe that they can very easily and quickly be made white as wool, and wear a crown in the kingdom of glory. They are the enemies of Bennett and friends of Liberalism. What a glorious thing it would be to be the crowned among the crowned, and rule over the thousands of thieves, robbers, murderers, etc., who are being sent to orthodox heaven washed in the blood of the lamb!

Let every friend of the Liberal League do something to show his appreciation of the principles he advocates, and make Mr. Bennett feel that he is not considered a criminal on his liberation. V. W. SUNDERLIN.

NEW YORK, April 6, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER! and it will liv; if any one doubts it let him read about the way Horace Greeley was served when he endeavored, as he says himself, with the best years of his life, to establish a newspaper, trusting, as you do, to the honesty of his readers to pay him after they had got his paper. It ruined him. But Freethinkers, it seems, do not forget their obligations so readily. If they did we would hav been without THE TRUTH SEEKER long since. I trust that Mr. Bennett's friends do not forget that they can still encourage, comfort, and sustain the noble founder of his paper by sending him their sympathies during the remaining days of his infamous incarceration.

Inclosed find thirteen dollars. Please retain subscription for your paper of the current year, and do me the kindness to hand the remaining ten to the treasurer of the committee on the reception of Mr. Bennett. I remain, and forever will,

An outspoken Liberal, J. C. JONES.

BART, PA., March 28, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Kind Friend: Inclosed please find three dollars for Mr. Bennett's new book. Now with your permission I should like to notice a few of E. A. Chapman's points of arguments in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 27th in relation to a future state of existence. He says, "I am certain that death doos not end all, that beyond the grave I shall liv, move, and hav an existence as real as that I now experience in this physical organism." Friend Chapman is very severe on Materialists for making assumptions without proof, and yet it seems to me that his article is full of assumptions from beginning to end; that he greatly practices what he condemns in others. How does he know he will liv after he is dead? Has he proved it, or is it a mere assumption? After saying, "Christians need no proof, faith is all sufficient. Still it is an open question," he says, "Thousands of the ablest of the race believe that death is annihilation or an eternal sleep." To admit it is an open question seems to me to be fatal to his assumption that he will liv beyond the grave. To them who disbelive in a future life he says: "Every noble aspiration, every grand thought, all the beauties and mysteries of the universe, must seem as mockeries. To them the heavens and the earth must be draped in mourning." Indeed, what a huge assertion. How does he know all this. I will not speak for others, but will speak for myself. I hav no faith or belief in a God or hereafter, yet I think I can appreciate and enjoy the beauties of nature and mysteries of the universe as well perhaps as the true believer. I love the budding trees, the blooming flowers, the green earth with its wealth of vegetable and animal life. I love the mountains, the valleys, the clear-running, musical streams, the blue sky, and above all, that glorious old life-giving sun. I love this earth with all its imperfections, with its cold dreary winters, its scorching hot summers, its storms and tempests, its earthquakes and volcanoes. On the whole it is a pretty good mother; it is my home, my only home that I know anything about. For myself I can say with truth, the heavens and the earth are not draped with mourning. I would here caution friend Chapman not to be in a hurry to judge his brother, for remember it is a very easy matter to be mistaken.

Friend Chapman's reasoning on cause and effect, is good until he asserts, "the soul is the cause, the body is the result." Here it seems to me he mistakes the cause for the effect. I should rather suppose that sense, will, and intelligence are the effect, not the cause of organization. I think it will not be disputed that without a corresponding physical body and brain there will not be much intelligence. Why is there in such a close affinity between the body, the five senses, the brain, and the soul or spirit or the intelligence? Why, if the spirit can liv independent of the body, why is it it can't manifest the same amount of intelligence in an idiot as it does in a Newton? or why not manifest all the intelligence people possess, without any brains? The brain is a very tender, delicate, complicated piece of organism, and surely if it could be dispensed with without any detriment to man's intellect he would be a more fortunate creature. He would not be subject to any of the brain diseases, nor would he be likely to become insane. Why, if the brain is injured, diseased, or overworked do people become insane? Surely if the spirit can liv separate and independent of the body, there should be no insanity, no matter how much the brain may be affected or diseased. Friend Chapman says, "If death ends all, humanity is a bubble, progression and evolution are limited, and the universe is a gigantic failure." That is a big one; I mean it is a gigantic assertion. Because man has to die and don't liv again beyond the grave, with his personal identity unchanged, why, the whole universe, with millions on millions of suns and worlds must all be out of joint, a miserable gigantic failure! Because a vain egotistical, tyrannical, creature called man, that tyrannizes over all the animals that are of any use to him, enslaves and eats them at his will and pleasure, and not content with that, tyrannizes and enslaves one another—because this immaculate, holy, saintly creature does not liv forever, why, behold, the whole universe is an entire failure! This is most wonderful, but suppose we hav the proof.

"Mere flesh, blood, or nerves can never produce sensation, joy, grief, love, thoughts, or consciousness."

Another blank assumption. Has it ever been proved there ever was sensation, love, joy, grief, and so on, without flesh and blood and nerves. To tell us our eyes are windows for the soul to look out of is not very complimentary to the soul, for what possible use has a soul for windows, or even eyes? We are gravely told by Spiritualists that the soul can't be confined—that if confined in an iron box, or a box of the hardest steel and of any thickness, it will pass through just as an eel does through water. According to this it must be very small, or at least has the power to make itself so. I hav somewhere read that 40,000 souls could dance on the point of a very fine needle, and not crowd each other off. If this be so, I don't doubt but they can go through glass or the hardest steel without ever touching or ruffling a feather.

"Everywhere in this world the blind are found leading the blind."

If Spiritualism is true, and spirits rule this Material universe and all its organisms, whose fault is it that this blindness, this wrong, wretchedness, and evil that has gone on from time immemorial and is still going on on a tremendous scale on this globe? It will not do to father this on material man, for, according to Spiritualists, he is a mere machine entirely in the hands of the spirits, and of course can do nothing of himself. All the wars, all the terrible persecutions and wrongs that man has committed against man, all the misery and suffering, as well as all the good, has been the work of the spirits. Why do they not put a stop to all wars, all wrongs, and make a paradise here—a heaven instead of a hell. It is an insult to tell the innocent, the poor, the weak, the down-trodden, that they will be rewarded, away off in some other world after they are dead, for their sufferings here—those wrongs all righted and the books balanced. This seems to me a crawling out of a very small hole—an inglorious retreat.

Friend Chapman thinks it wonderful that a little twig of a sweet apple grafted on a sour one will produce sweet apples. One thing in nature is just about as wonderful as another. The sap that is taken up by the sour apple-tree is precisely the same as that taken up by the sweet one. The sap don't go directly to the fruit, but goes to the leaves, is there digested (for the leaves are its lungs and stomach) and changed, and from there passes to, and is absorbed by, the fruit. The nutriment that is taken up from the ground with the sap passes directly to the leaves, is there chemically combined with the oxygen of the air, and digested and changed into food, and then is taken up by the fruit. It produces the sweet apple precisely the same as if this twig extended down and took root in the ground. The woods are of the same species; but graft the apple on a pear-tree, or a pear on an apple-tree, and you will get neither pears nor apples, because they are of different species. Everything produces after its kind. The acorn always produces the oak, and hens' eggs were never known to hatch turkeys nor ducks, or vice versa.

Friend Chapman is heartily welcome to all the proof of a life beyond the grave that he can get out of this little apple twig—this wonderful metamorphosis, as he calls it.

The allusion to the silk-worm as an illustration case of Spiritualism is, I think, rather unfortunate. There is no death here—only a change of form—until it comes to the butterfly; then there is a real death, not a transformation. Whether the gay butterfly is immortal and goes to the spirit land as an ornament, we are not told; and I would giv it as my opinion that it is as worthy a place in that happy land as is that most overbearing, domineering, tyrannical creature called man.

"Destroy the stomach and you destroy digestion; destroy the brain and you destroy the mind."

Is this not literally the truth? And if it is an assumption to say the mind is a function of the brain, in my opinion it is a greater assumption to say the brain is an instrument of the mind.

"The mind is fortunate that has a good brain to work with."

Here I again ask the question, If the mind can liv and act independent and out of the brain, why can't it act in an idiotic or a diseased, weak brain, as well as a good, sound one? If the mind is primary, and can work without a brain, it will not do to say it needs tools, for that would be a superfluous absurdity.

Oh, no; Immaterialists are not dogmatical; their assumptions and hypotheses are sober facts, and yet they tell us this great immortal, immaterial soul, spirit, mind, or whatever it is called, that has been from the beginning, that can't die or be hurt, that can pass through all bodies, enters the child's brain in its mother's womb, grows up with the material body and brain, strengthens and develops as the material body is developed, declines as the material house that it has occupied declines, and finally, when this dwelling becomes disintegrated, it is set free, and goes away off to some other world, and there abides forever and forever. But the most wonderful, the most marvelous, thing about this all-powerful, infinite soul is that it needs material tools to work with and windows to look out of.

With the liability of becoming dogmatical, I must contend that there is no such thing as innate ideas or knowledge—that all the knowledge we possess, of every description, we get through the five senses. When the child is born it brain is like a clean, blank sheet of paper—not a rule mars, not an idea, not a thought, nor never would, nor could, be without the senses. A person born deaf has no idea of sound; one born blind has no idea of form or color, and if all the senses are wanting, although the brain may be that of a Franklin, or a Paine, it would hav no more knowledge than a stone or a block of wood. If it has ever been proved and made clear that there is any other medium than through our senses of getting knowledge, I should like to know it. I confess my utter ignorance of this sixth sense called Spirituality, and if there is such a sense I should suppose all would hav it, yet I will venture to say nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every one thousand persons never heard of it, and science has never recognized any such a sense. Every living organized creature or animal manifests some degree of intelligence, and all this intelligence, of whatever degree, comes through the same source—the organs of sense. Man's intelligence differs only in degree from all other organized creature's, even down to the oyster or the earth-worm.

I will close this by quoting a sentence from Abner Kneeland's "Philosophical Creed," written in 1833:

"I believe that there can be no will or intelligence where there is no sense, and no sense where there are no organs of sense; and hence sense, will, and intelligence are the effect and not the cause of organization."

I was a reader of the Boston Investigator when that sentence was first published, and hav never yet seen it successfully controverted. I. KING.

FORT DODGE, GA., Feb. 16, 1880.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Though removed from the immediate scene of your persecution, we nevertheless feel that the cause for which you are now a sufferer is in every sense our own. The freedom and inviolability of the mails is something that should concern every citizen of this land. When people, who because they are odious to the Lord's first lieutenant, Anthony Comstock, are incarcerated in penitentiaries ostensibly for circulating a pamphlet like "Cupid's Yokes," while canting hypocrites and designing priests are allowed unquestioned to peddle the "word of God" in the shape of Bibles—than which a more filthy book cannot be found—it is time people found out "the why and wherefore." The pamphlet itself is one which most of us heartily condemn. So do we also condemn the Bible and sycophantic tracts, but we never question the right of publishers to publish nor dealers to circulate them. "Equality before the law!" does not mean that Anthony Comstock may send his lewd Bibles and filthy letters through the mails at will and that you shall languish in a prison for circulating something less lewd. But Comstock and Judge Benedict hav laid up for themselves their "crown of righteousness." History has them in hand, and they will be pointed at with loathing in years to come, as examples of the darkness of the age which they hav disgraced, as we now point to the leading spirits in the Spanish Inquisition.

You hav many warm friends in this community, Mr. Bennett, who will always heartily co-operate in your every effort to disseminate knowledge, to tear down the throne from which priests wield the scepter, to promote virtue and purity and to ameliorate the condition of mankind. But we are all poor, and cannot do what we would like to do to assist you. Iowa has had "hard picking" for the past few years; but if the star of prosperity continues to rise yet a little longer we may be able to do something toward the maintenance of your valuable paper, which we recognize as a very important auxiliary in the spreading of light and knowledge. We send $1.00 each for four months' subscription, and by that time we shall probably be able to renew for a year, and also to add many more to the list. We hav all "come to stay." Respectfully yours,

N. H. DELANO,
H. P. HAYNES,
H. N. SANBORN,
E. D. MARSHALL,

CALISTOGA, CAL., April 11, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: In your issue of April 3d, copied from the Winsted Press, is an article entitled "Attacking Free Speech." I hav just been talking with a gentleman that I know to be truthful and who has long been in the employ of the Pacific Rolling Mills of San Francisco, and he says he heard Kearney used all the vile epithets he could think of against the judge who sentenced him, and that Kearney was tried and convicted for slander and threatening the life, indirectly, of a gentleman who is a sugar refiner and who would not discharge his Chinamen at the dictation of the sand-lot orator. He says it is believed by many that those who will not be blackmailed are attacked in his peculiar manner until they yield or strike back. All this person said agrees substantially with the impressions I hav received from the San Francisco papers. So that in the Kearney case free speech has not been attacked in the sense referred to in the article copied. Mr. Kearney has, no doubt, done good by his persistent agitation, but I am sure he has said much that has done harm, and said it in a very bad style.

I am a workingman practically, not politically, yet my sympathies go with all parties honestly trying to improve the condition of the toilers. I know that law and business arrangements are much in favor of the wealthy classes, and that many wealthy people concern themselves more how to gain still more wealth than how to make their fellow-men comfortable and contented; in fact, there are those who follow their selfish aims so far that the effect is equal to a slow murder of those in their power. The poor feel this most of all, and it is not to be wondered at that now and then some one oversteps the proper bounds in speech or action. While I am pleased to see any and every paper defend free speech, free press, and free mails, I am sorry that any should abuse that freedom so as to work injury upon any one.

Mr. Bennett's case is very different from that of Mr. Kearney's. Bennett has always kept within reasonable bounds and had a farce of a trial, while Kearney had what seems a fair trial and confessed that he had used the language charged against him.

I hav written this, not to condemn Kearney or censure the Winsted Press, but to correct any impression that might be made by taking the view that Kearney is a martyr or that freedom of speech has been attacked in his person. Should I find in the future that I am wrong in what I hav written, I will be as ready to correct myself as I hav been to correct the Winsted Press.

In this connection let me add my mite in the welcome home of Mr. Bennett. Being so far away, and possessed of but small means, I cannot be present on the occasion; however, I can say that I am glad that he will at last come oue of his confinement to breathe the pure air and enjoy th sunlight of nature and of his fellow-men, and hope he may feel well repaid in the end for the long, dreary sacrifice he has made for the truth and the right. I like to make people feel happy and contented while they liv rather than neglect them in life to heap encomiums upon their graves. It can do the departed but little good, I think, but it will help the living a great deal. So "at thy return with joyful glee glad echoes now are ringing," Welcome! Welcome! Welcome!

J. C. WEYBRIGHT.

BOSTON, MASS, April 2, 1880.

MY DEAR BENNETT: I must congratulate you that the time has so near come when you will be delivered out of the hands, not of the Philistines but of the Christians (a Christian bastile) and once more breathe the free and pure air of the universe. I wish also to congratulate your brave and noble little wife, who has been so patient and faithful all through this trying ordeal, for these hav been times that hav tried your very souls, yet neither of you hav been found wanting. So welcome, thou brave and noble martyr, to freedom, home, and friends. For humanity you hav suffered, and humanity will reward you; for I do think there never was an evil but what some good came out of it. If you had not been persecuted and imprisoned we never should hav had these brave and noble letters from Ludlow and Albany. If you had not been imprisoned perhaps it would not hav brought out the genius and masterly pen of a Leland, a Wakeman, a Parton, and a host of brave and noble souls all over the land, both men and women, in defense of humanity.

If you had not been imprisoned perhaps we should not hav fully realized what a stupendous fraud we hav in the executive chair to-day, and who is governed by the bigots of the evangelical church, and has thereby ignored the rights of the people in a petition from the people the largest in the annals of history, thereby saying to us, "You hav no rights which we (the church) are bound to respect." And finally, if you had not been imprisoned your grand and noble TRUTH SEEKER would not hav been so extensively read as it is to-day. And all this, my dear friend, has caused an agitation that will not down nor cease, both in the religious and political atmosphere, until justice is satisfied; and it seems to me that no honest man, with his eyes open, will follow either great political party; and I would most respectfully call upon all Liberals of whatever shade of religion, to combine, or pool their issues. Stop these love pats, and don't waste your ammunition, but save it for the common enemy. In this respect we might take a lesson from the church. They quarrel among themselves until they find an outside enemy, then they all combine to fight it, as they are now doing. They hav already smote us hard on one cheek; now shall we turn the other to them and let them smite that also? or shall we meet them as Greek meets Greek?

Old theology is getting a terrible shaking here in Boston just now by the powerful and masterly Denton, who is delivering a course of lectures here in Paine Hall.

Yours for justice and truth, J. EDWARDS ANDREWS.

PORTLANDVILLE, N. Y., April 15, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed find $1.00, for which please send me six copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The balance please giv to H. L. Green, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League.

I hope the day is not far distant when the number of subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER will be augmented to that degree that the paper can be furnished for $2.00 with a good liberal profit to the editor. I think if every subscriber would exert himself a little that it could be increased to that degree within a year. I believe a reduced subscription fee would be the means of greatly facilitating an increased circulation, and thus be the means of diffusing truth more rapidly. Three dollars appears like a large sum for a poor man that has all he can do to make both ends meet. Notwithstanding, when you get a subscriber at those figures it is a good evidence that you hav one that appreciates the paper. I make it a point to send my paper to some one who I think will read it, as soon as I hav read its contents. I think this plan would be a good one for each subscriber to adopt. It will only cost about fifty cents per year to send them by mail to some friends who you think will be benefited by their perusal, and fifty cents is a small amount for one to donate to build up so great and good a cause as the liberty of thought and conscience. Every good American citizen should value his freedom too high to allow it to dwindle or slip his grasp by neglecting or refusing to sustain an instrument so essential to its vitality.

Wishing you a happy success so long as you are devoted to liberty and truth, I remain, Ever yours,

PETER SOULE.

CONCORDIA, KAN., April 9, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I send you with this an exchange draft amounting to $2.00, which you will please apply to my subscription account and oblige me. My heart and sympathies are still for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the cause of free speech, free press, and free mails, and I rejoice that the time is near at hand when Mr. Bennett will step forth from prison more purified in person and feeling, more exalted in the minds of a liberty-loving people, and better qualified to lead in the cause of humanity than ever before. May the cause of justice and truth still go marching on with such rapid strides as to establish within the coming year an epoch within the history of our country which will forever suppress the dogmatical encroachments of churchly power. This must be, and the masses are fast awakening to the fact, as is evidenced by the late unprecedented increase of auxiliary Leagues, that the churches must soon assume a less dictatorial tone in matters pertaining to the rights of those who choose to dissent from them in opinions. We see and feel this increase of Liberal sentiment to-day, not alone in the modified sentiment of those who but yesterday were extremely bitter in their denunciation of radical expressions of thought, but in the bitter death-struggle of priests to inaugurate a censorship over the press and free mails.

Long may our standard, beautifully emblazoned with the stars of our nine demands, float proudly to the breeze, and in the coming time may all classes and conditions of men hail it as the grandest and most ennobling emblem ever given to humanity. Respectfully. A. R. CLEMENT.

NORWAY, IOWA, April 14, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: I am highly gratified at the eminently successful manner in which you and your assistants hav conducted the gallant TRUTH SEEKER during the incarceration of Mr. Bennett, and I trust that when your now imprisoned chief once more takes his rightful place at the head of the best Freethought paper in the world he will find you both able and willing to help him carry the war into the enemy's territory and spread abroad the light as it is in science and secularism.

Mr. Bennett's letters from Albany are very interesting and valuable, and I suppose that you will publish them in book form. They will constitute a very important part of the history of the conflict. Those prominent Liberals, men and women, who stood by Mr. Bennett through the dark and perilous time when it seemed as though the cloud hanging above his devoted head would also enshroud their loyal hearts in its foul eclipse, deserve well at our hands. All honor to James Parton, Elizur Wright, Amy Post, and others like them who did not permit the love of fame or the fear of contumely to chain their truth-speaking tongues or seal their eloquent lips when truth's and liberty's apostle was struck down by the mailed hand of religious intolerance and one-sidedness. Honor to the brave and loyal hearts, and let the finger of scorn and the accent of doubt follow the cowards and traitors until they do work meet for repentance.

A candid expression of opinion is always in order. Bro. H. L. Green has recently said, "With the opinions advanced in the pamphlet above named ('Cupid's Yokes') I hav no sympathy whatever, but on the contrary, believe that they are the very worst that could be promulgated." As a soldier in that great army of which Bro. Green is a trusted and true leader, permit me to say that I hav a great deal of sympathy with the opinions advanced in that pamphlet, and that I consider them as the very best that hav so far been promulgated. The reforms advocated in "Cupid's Yokes" are much needed and must come, how soon we do not know, but probably much sooner than many anticipate. Hail the day of the advent of a new society and a better morality! E. C. WALKER.

AN OPEN LETTER TO E. A. CHAPMAN.

WACONDA, KAN.

FRIEND CHAPMAN: I hav just read your long article, "Does Death End All?" and as I fail to see the proof just where I hav always failed on reading and listening to Spiritualist's lectures, I do wish you would giv it me in some plain, short, common-sense way—some way that my faculties can comprehend. I may say just here that I hav the five senses for the express purpose of bringing me into contact with all material things, but to discover a spirit these are useless, as I hav tried them in that line for more than half a century. Then I hav that faculty which seeks for and obtains proof of things not present, as for example the existence of Paris or Calcutta, and these are all the faculties that I possess to bring me into contact with all things. Now if you can so present the subject as to cause me to comprehend it through the last faculty, I shall feel much obliged to you. As to the appeal to the five senses, that is played out.

You say that causes are invisible, yet I think if you, by accident, tread on my toes, I can by eye-sight alone discover the cause of pain. And if I retaliate and giv you an unmerciful beating, you too would consider you had discovered the cause of pain, and hav me arrested for assault and battery, and judge and jury would believe your evidence of the cause.

You say that if death ends all, humanity is a bubble. Well, now, if it don't end all, what is it? Certainly so much of good it has done is a good bubble, while the bad may be a bad bubble; but, bubbles as they may be, it is better to be a good bubble than a bad one, a happy bubble than a miserable bubble; and so far as I know, every Materialist thinks just there, and that it is his duty to produce or amend circumstances so that all the bubbles may be happy ones; and is there anything in your country over the shining river that beats happiness? All that is required of Spiritualists is to prove the existence of a soul. Mere assertion will not do for this age. We hav so much of pseudo-philosophy trying to be palmed off on the credulous that it needs great exertion to expose these impostors. Quite lately we had one here endeavoring to prove in his way that the last analysis was spirit; but just as soon as he was challenged to a discussion with a Materialist—the latter agreeing to pay his expenses and the hall rent—he declined, and of course left his cause worse than he found it. DOWAGIAC, MICH.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed you will find extracts from a letter I wrote at the dictation of E. V. Robinson, a blind but intelligent Infidel. The subject matter was too good to be lost, so I induced him to let me copy it for publication. Yours in hate, DR. T. RIX.

The following is the extract:

SHALL I ACCEPT THE BRIBE?

Extract from a letter to Rev. J. M. Robinson, of Edwardsburgh, Michigan:

GRAND HAVEN, MICH.

DEAR BROTHER: Some time ago I applied to your friend, Elder Force, of this city, for the use of his church, or rather an old building which they were using as a church, for my singing class, and was flatly denied. The first excuse was some technicalities about the lease, but the second, and I think the real one, was my Infidelity. I told him I had said nothing of my views since I came, and, furthermore, I did not intend to. And as I was teaching church-music, which would be helping his choir and congregation, I could see no ground for the objection. All this, my dear brother, was of no avail, but he told me that if I would only be a Christian I could get plenty of business to do.

Well, what shall be done? I assert emphatically that I cannot help my belief; and you, as I understand, credit me with strict sincerity in what I say. There is but one alternative. You know, and Elder Force knows, and everybody else knows, that it is very easy to counterfeit the Christian religion; and so you see we hav a cash bribe for such vile hypocrisy. In other words, I am literally outlawed for refusing to do the very thing which is denounced in the most unmeasured terms, and that too by one of his disciples.

But Elder Force makes no allowance for my manhood in standing out against this infamous bribe, and that too under all my load of poverty, blindness, lameness, sickness, and a family to provide for. No; he evidently thinks me a mean dog just because I don't believe in his religion; but I think that the dog, if there is any, is on the other side of the fence.

Again, I ask, What shall I do? Shall I accept the bribe, as thousands do, at the expense of my manhood? I say, deliberately and emphatically, that I will die in the poor-house, or even on a dung-hill, before I will be the victim of such hellish duplicity.

Well, it cost me several days of hard work traveling on my weak legs and over two dollars cash to find and fit up a class, and it came very near smashing the business at that. I told Elder Force that he was not doing as he would be done by, and he had the impudence, or perhaps the stupidity, to deny it, and even accused me of duplicity in asking favors of the church. From your brother,

E. V. ROBINSON.

P. S.—Perhaps Mr. Force thinks that by such conduct he will win me to the fold of Christ. Dear brother, do you think he will? E. V. R.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Madam: Inclosed find post-office order for six dollars and fifty cents, to be applied as heretofore. This I suppose to be the last remittance that I will feel called upon to make for this specific purpose; and those who hav contributed, and those who hav not, will rejoice in the liberation of your husband from the clutches of prejudice, superstition, and bigotry. And with the hope that our people will soon become so educated that it will be impossible for any one to be cast into prison who has injured no one either in person or property, I am,

A. C. C. TAMSEN TO MRS. SLENKER.

BROOKLYN, E. D., April 6, 1880.

MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER, Dear Madam: I, and no doubt hundreds of others, hav read with great satisfaction your answer to J. H. Dodd (presumably a reverend) in last week's TRUTH SEEKER. Your fearless and pointed manner of expression has won my admiration. I would that more people had, like you, the ability and the determination to point out such facts in history as hav been proved erroneous.

That George Washington has been greatly overrated, and Thomas Paine in the same measure been underrated, no lover of truth and justice can deny.

Ingersoll's so-called sneers may shock the over-sensitive nature of Mr. Dodd; but while great men like Ingersoll utter wise and noble sentiments, and, according to Dodd, men too poor to buy their wives decent clothes pay one dollar to hear Ingersoll mock the Savior and blaspheme God Almighty, there is hope for the ultimate liberation of the American people from priestcraft.

And while such champions as Mrs. Slenker are numbered in our ranks, we are greatly encouraged to hope that the Liberal cause will also reach and interest the women of this country, at least those who are not too much enslaved by religious superstition and not afraid to think and act for themselves. Respectfully and fraternally yours,

A. C. C. TAMSEN.

OTTUMWA, IOWA, March 31, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The Liberals of Ottumwa, hav made a good start; they hav sent the names of twenty charter members, and got their charter in due time, but as yet hav failed to finish their organization. It has been a month or six weeks since we got our charter, and we hav not elected our officers yet. There seems to be a feeling of indifference or a lack of confidence in our ability to push the thing through to completion. There is a numerous Liberal element in this city, but business seems to absorb their whole mind and effort. I wish some of our Liberal lecturers would make it a point to giv us a call in their lecture rounds and assist us to finish our organization and get us started in the grand cause of full liberty. The means to pay for a course of lectures could easily be raised here I am satisfied. Please let our needs be known through THE TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed find twenty-five cents.

Yours, WM. LINDSEY.

ONTARIO, CANADA.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find five dollars, which you will please place to my credit. Before sitting down to write, I read the first two chapters of Genesis (something I hav not done for several years), and tried, as far as possible, to judge what would be the impression they would make on my mind provided I had never read them before; in fact, to read them as I would read the two first chapters of some one of the many other bibles in the world that men believe in as divine inspiration. It would be too lengthy to describe the various thoughts that passed through my mind, but one was, if evolution had been the old fossilized idea, and this story, or theory, the work of some modern thinker, what a fine chance it would giv the like of Joseph Cook to show his critical abilities tearing it to pieces! The probability is that this is simply one of the many answers given to the questions, How did things come to exist? How did man come to hav a place in the world? Not necessarily "cunningly devised," and yet not necessarily true. Since man found himself an intelligent being, he has been always trying to answer those questions; one propounding and another upsetting, and so the war goes on.

Although not living in your country, I hav felt a deep interest in the struggle that is going on between Freethought and Christianity. I hav keenly sympathized with Mr. Bennett, not because I believe as he does, or approve of all his ways, but because I believe him to be upright, sincere, well-meaning, humane, and unselfish. I also believe that he cannot help his thoughts nor change his natural tendencies, and that except he was infringing on the rights and liberties of others, he has a right to his own liberty and the free expression of his thoughts. It is, in my opinion, a piece of the grossest barbarism to put a man into the penitentiary for doing what he believed to be right, unless, at least, it could be proved that some one was injured by his going at large.

I look with a great deal of charity on all shades of human character, believing that people are just what circumstances make them. If I were Anthony Comstock I would do as he does. If I were Abbot I would conduct the Index just as he is doing. If I were Bennett I would hav done just as he has done and suffered the consequence just as he is doing. Even in the most enlightened countries a great deal of barbarism and cruelty is practiced and much misery engendered simply because man has not yet risen high enough to recognize complacently that diversity of opinion which is one of the greatest blessings to society.

F. MALCOLM.

BARNETT, NEB, March 21, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I hav just been reading in the Seymour Times the lecture of Robert Ingersoll on the anniversary of Paine's birthday, and I must confess it is one of the ablest lectures I ever read in my life. Ingersoll as a speaker and D. M. Bennett as a writer are the two champions of this world in my opinion. I just read Mr. Bennett's "Eighth Letter from Albany." Oh, how I wish every man in this world would read it! I am the only one in this vicinity that takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I am not the only one that reads it. When I get it read through I pass it around until it is worn out. I think by another year I can get some more subscribers for it.

Yours respectfully, DANIEL W. WHITNEY.

This book contains an inspired PHOTOGRAPH of the GOD that's being worshiped at the expense of the district in our public schools; the God that "overshadowed" Mary; the God that's wanted in the Constitution; the gentleman that owns some three billion dollars' worth of untaxed church property; the "so-help-me" God that makes a lie the truth in court; the God that governors besought to stop the yellow fever, which he didn't do. ## ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are a liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR in person or by mail FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

CONCERNING

Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read. ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELER

Issues of the Age.

CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED IN MODERN THOUGHT.

BY HENRY C. PEDDER.

Extra cloth, beveled, black and gold back and side stamps, 12mo, 185 pp., price, $1.00.

Everything that we now deem of antiquity was at one time new; and what we now defend by examples will at a future period stand as precedents.—Tacitus.

An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.

He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces a thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

Situation Wanted

By a middle-aged lady as assistant to some good eclectic physician. Address

Mrs. MARY E. STRONG.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterise "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $1.75.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

AUTHORITIES.—On Egypt, Wilkinson, Rawlinson's Herodotus, Bunsen; Ethiopia or Abyssinia, Bruce, Baker, Lepsius; Carthage, Heeren's African Nations, Niebuhr, Mommsen; East Africa, Vincent's Periplus, Gulliain, Hakluyt Society's Publications; Moslem Africa (Central), Park, Caille, Denham and Clapperton, Lander, Barth, Ibn Batuta, Leo Africanus; Guinea and South Africa, Azurara, Barros, Major, Hakluyt Purchas, Livingstone.

Assyria, Sir H. Rawlinson, Layard; India, Max Muller, Webber; Persia, Heerens' Asiatic Nations; Central Asia, Burnes, Wolff, Vambery; Arabia, Niebuhr, Caussin de Perceval, Sprenger, Deutsch, Muir, Burckhardt, Burton, Palgrave; Palestine, Dean Stanley, Renan, Dollinger, Spinoza, Robinson, Neander.

Greece, Grote, O. Meller, Curtius, Heerens, Lewes, Taine, About, Becker's Charicles; Rome, Gibbon, Macaulay, Becker's Gallus; Dark Ages, Hallam, Guizot, Robertson, Prescott, Irving; Philosophy of History, Herder, Buckle, Comte Lecky, Mill, Draper; Science, Darwin, Lyell' Herbert Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Vestiges of Creation, Wallace, Tylor, Lubbock.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill."—Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—Penn Monthly.

We could scarcely hav supposed it possible for any writer, however gifted, to put into one volume, reasonable in size and price, so much reliable information, sound logic, and inspiring thought.—Literary Review.

The Scientific Aspect of Prayer. etc., etc.

VOLUNTARY OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

A lecture replete with eloquence.—San Francisco Chronicle.

She is a powerful advocate of the cause she has espoused.—San Jose Mercury.

Mrs. Lake is the best lady lecturer that has ever appeared before a Portland audience.—Portland Oregonian.

As a speaker she is vastly superior to any woman we hav ever heard; for beauty of diction, depth of thought, and grace in delivery she is remarkable.—Salem (Or.) Record.

She has the power of entrancing her audience, and, by her eloquence, commanding the respect of those most opposed to her.—Corvallis Gazette.

Mrs. Lake is one of the finest orators we hav ever listened to. Can hardly be excelled by any speaker on this coast, either man or woman.—Yreka Journal.

Her eloquence and masterly style giv evidence of a highly cultivated mind as well as a complete comprehension of her subject.—Eureka (Nev.) Sentinel.

Whatever cause she espouses has in her an advocate of more power and brilliancy than is usually found on the rostrum, and her influence will be felt wherever she goes.—Council Bluffs Nonpareil.

Pleasant appearance, graceful carriage, a good elocutionist, eloquent, using well-chosen language to express her ideas.—Clinton Herald.

Mrs. Lake is a brilliant speaker, finely cultured, a trained elocutionist, and a powerful advocate of truth, reason, and constitutional liberty.—Le Claire Pilot.

She may be addressed, Clinton, Iowa.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

Tyndall's Belfast Inaugural Address

and the famous articles of

Prof. Tyndall and Sir Henry Thompson

ON PRAYER.

With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of Prof. Tyndall. And opinions of his services by the eminent scientist, Prof.

H. HELMHOLTZ.

Paper, 12mo, 105pp., 25 cts.; cloth, heavy tinted paper, 50 cts. Inaugural and portrait only, 12mo, paper, 69pp., 10 cts.

Prof. Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world. —N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in the world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

A New and Important Work, entitled

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY.

BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,

Graduate of the Hygeio-Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.

The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,

141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Right of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Vol. 7. No. 18. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, May 1, 1880. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

MR. ROADS is a schoolteacher at Earl, Pa. He is religious, and impiety shocks him terribly. When a little girl denied having torn a book, and called on God to witness that she told the truth, he was grieved beyond expression by what he deemed her blasphemy. He grabbed her in one hand and a club in the other, and beat her until he was weary and she insensible. She was maimed for life and he has gone to prison for two years.

A GENTLEMAN writing to THE TRUTH SEEKER makes some pungent and appropriate remarks on the wonderful success of Truth, which he declares to be "the most outspoken paper in the city." "It is," says this kindly critic, "just the paper New York has long been in need of, exposing corruptions and frauds," etc. True enough. Well said. But the writer of this letter makes a grave error when he declares that "Truth has ridiculed the Witness out of existence!" This, we are reliably informed, is not so. Careful inquiry establishes the fact that the Witness is still published—as a weekly.—Truth.

YOUNG Kalloch, now in jail in San Francisco, is a preacher, the son of a preacher, and the grandson of a preacher. He was brought up on the Bible. Prayer has been a familiar sound in his ears ever since he began to understand the meaning of words. He has heard hundreds of sermons, and latterly he has preached them himself. As a minister it has been his professional business to expound to sinners the Ten Commandments and the precepts of Christ, including that one about returning good for evil. Yet all this has not prevented young Kalloch from shooting the man who shot his father.—Sun.

JUST after Mr. Conroy, of Schoharie county, this state, had read a chapter of the Bible at family prayers, the lightning struck his house, cavorted around in a promiscuous way, smashed the furniture, and started several small fires, but not a hair on the head of any member of the Conroy family was harmed. Edward Coleman, of this city, by all accounts, is not as pious as Mr. Conroy, of Schoharie. In fact, it is alleged that he belongs to a wicked gang. But he had a Testament in his left breast pocket the other night, when policeman Linderman fired at him, and it turned aside a bullet that would otherwise hav lodged in his heart.

DELEGATE Downey of Wyoming introduced a bill in the House, April 12th, with the preamble: "WHEREAS, The people of the United States are a Christian people and firmly believe in God, the father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth," etc., etc., reciting the balance of the Apostles' Creed, and providing for an appropriation of $500,000 to be expended under the direction of the architect of the Capitol to commemorate in suitable paintings by the great living artists of this country, upon the walls of the national Capitol, the birth, life, and death of our Savior Jesus, as told in the four gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John!

THE obliging and meek apostle of our Lord and Savior, Rev. Joseph Cotton, quotes a number of eminent men to prove that the Bible is the best book ever printed, and that it is all the book needed. But we hav the book itself. Why didn't he introduce it as evidence? You cannot bring in testimony to prove what a book or paper is or says when the book or paper itself exists and can be submitted. And if this Bible is so chaste and good a book, why doesn't brother Cotton avail himself of our standing offer of five dollars an hour for the minister who will stand up and read the Bible to his congregation, we selecting the chapters and passages? We are still wanting to employ ministers for that holy service. Does the good man believe God wrote the 38th chapter of Genesis?—Seymour Times.

D. M. BENNETT, the victim of Comstockism, who is now in the Albany Penitentiary for the so-called crime of sending obscene literature through the mails, is expecting to be released at the expiration of his time of imprisonment, April 29th. His friends in New York and elsewhere are preparing to giv him a public reception at Chickering Hall, in that city, on Sunday, May 2d. Bennett has another suit of a similar nature to that which resulted in his imprisonment hanging over him at Watkins, N. Y., where on the occasion of a Liberal convention he sold copies of the objectionable "Cupid's Yokes," a pamphlet published by Mr. E. H. Heywood, of Princeton, Mass., of whom it can now be obtained. Mr. Bennett has written a book during his imprisonment and dedicated it to the wife of the warden of the prison, whom he extols for her kindness to the prisoners under her husband's care. We hope there will be no "hitch" in the arrangements at Albany to prevent Mr. Bennett's appearance at the banquet in New York, and that as a valiant defender of the right of free speech in this country the lion of the hour will be royally received.—Winsted Press.

WHATEVER else may be doubtful about the intention of the authors of our tariff laws, they undoubtedly meant to place on the free list all materials used in the manufacture of paper. It happened that pulp of wood, which is by far the most important element in the manufacture of paper used by the daily and weekly press of the country, was not specifically and by name exempted from duty. Under a Treasury decision, which held that this verbal omission was fatal to the free admission of wood pulp, a few manufacturers of that article hav been able to impose an exorbitant tax on the general body of paper-makers, by whom it is of course shifted on the consumers, the newspaper publishers of the country, and the burden falls with special hardship on publishers outside of the great cities—we, consequently, being impoverished so that a handful of monopolists may grow rich. The most powerful champion of these monopolists is Representative Garfield. Were his opposition to the bill withdrawn, the restoration of wood pulp to the free list, where it belongs, would be accomplished in a few days. While his opposition continues, the monopolists are secure. Can Mr. Garfield afford to continue his support of a most odious and oppressive tax, which brings in no revenue to the government, but which interferes very decidedly with the dissemination of knowledge among the people?

ALL genuine lovers of constitutional liberty will be glad to know that D. M. Bennett, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is to be released from the Albany (N. Y.) Penitentiary on the 29th of this month, the term for which he was sentenced expiring at that time. It will be remembered that over a year ago Mr. Bennett was arrested and thrown into prison for the alleged crime of sending a certain book through the mails entitled "Cupid's Yokes," his persecutors claiming that he was violating the law in regard to obscene literature, although every one who has taken the trouble to examine the facts knows the real cause of the persecution was the hatred borne him by that champion hypocrite, Anthony Comstock, and his co-religionists. Although there existed not the slightest reason for imprisoning this honest old man—thousands of worse books than "Cupid's Yokes" being sent through the mails every day—the authorities had not the moral courage to giv him justice, fearing to alienate the church by exonerating an avowed Infidel. Even after Mr. Bennett was sent to the penitentiary, his friends still had some hopes of procuring his release through the medium of a pardon, and besought his Fraudulency, Mr. Hayes, to use his prerogative and restore him to liberty, presenting petitions signed by over two hundred thousand citizens to that effect. At first Hayes was inclined to grant a pardon to Mr. Bennett, being implored to do so by Carl Schurz, John Sherman, Senator Devens, and other public personages. But finally Comstock and his horde, joined by Mrs. Hayes, prevailed, and his Fraudulency refused to listen to the prayers of the Liberals, and Mr. Bennett was doomed to a year in a vile prison, and all because some so-called Christians did not think an Infidel worthy to breathe the free God-given air with themselves. The Liberals will giv Mr. Bennett a grand reception on his return. They first engaged Cooper Institute, but the strait-laced party again prevailed, and they were informed that it would be impossible to grant that building for the ignoble purpose of giving a reception to a Freethinker. They then engaged Chickering Hall. While not upholding Mr. Bennett's religious principles, we deprecate such vile means as were used in procuring his downfall.—Hutchinson Herald.

A SENSIBLE rat will always desert a sinking ship, and while the theological seminaries are deploring the fact that so few young men are coming forward nowadays and studying for the ministry, it is also very noteworthy that a good many who hav heretofore been orthodox clergymen are now abandoning that profession, and engaging in some useful profession or avocation. For instance, there is the Rev. C. C. Griswold, now of Anoka, one of the most prominent Methodist clergymen in the state—one who for several years held the position of presiding elder—who has very sensibly concluded to let the Great Jehovah advance his own cause if he wants it advanced; and the Rev. Mr. Knight, a Methodist clergymen of Wadena, has also come to the conclusion that men's bodies need more attention and more doctoring than their souls, and he too has turned his attention to treating their physical ills, homeopathically. The Rev. Mr. Root, the Episcopal clergyman at Brainerd, announces his intention of quitting the ministry, and of opening out a bank and a real estate office at Valley City, D. T. Not only these, but the trades and professions all over the country, are full of men who were formerly clergymen or exhorters. We cheerfully admit that a great many clergymen are well-meaning men; but whether well-meaning or not, they are about the most useless men in society, and are a needless expense. They are useless because they do not tell us anything in regard to the past or the future that they know for a certainty, but simply that which they guess at. Such being the case, it is not to be wondered at that so many of them are quitting the business. We would be very glad to be able to announce that the clergy of this city had made up their minds to spend the rest of their lives in some useful calling. For instance, there is brother Tracey who, we think might make himself useful as a teacher; and Brother Bilbee who would succeed as an editor; and brother Cummings who was "cut out" for a doctor; and Rev. Mr. Flemming, the new brother at the Presbyterian church, who would make a good, reliable steady-going president of a bank, or an insurance company. We hope these brethren will all giv this matter their serious (and, if they want to, their prayerful) consideration.—Duluth Tribune.

THE Chicago Tribune of recent date contains the following:

"The editors and publishers of Western newspapers hav received a postal card which reads as follows:

"'We would be pleased to hav you make us an offer on your editorial passes and mileage tickets over any of the Chicago and Western railroads. We pay highest prices. Please state name of road it is over, limit, and other particulars. Also state lowest price for what you hav. Do not sell to any one else until you giv us a chance to make you an offer. Send your reply in a sealed envelope.

"JOHN RICHMOND & Co.

"'330 East Ohio st., Chicago.'

"No scalper by that name is known to liv at the above place, nor is any such man known to do a scalping business in this city. There are, however, some railroad employees boarding at the above number, which creates a suspicion that the circular has been issued in the interest of the railroads for the purpose of finding out what newspaper men are dishonest enough to dispose of their passes. If any are taken in and offer to sell, their passes and tickets will be revoked and their names placed on the black list. However this may be, the parties who send these postal cards are clearly violating the postal laws, for it is an offer to induce people to commit a crime by disposing of property which they hav no right to sell. Whether sent by scalpers or railroad officials, these postal cards should be confiscated by the post-office authorities, and the parties sending them apprehended and punished according to law."

This article is certainly full of suggestions, to newspaper men especially. It is certainly bad faith to sell passes or mileage tickets to the brokers, but since when did it become a crime? And if the railroads wish to take this method of finding out what editors act in bad faith, under what law can postmasters or post-office authorities confiscate the postal cards? We know Anthony Comstock, the procurer, who boasts of originating the law for the purification of the mails, is using the mails to induce men to commit crime, and then having them arrested. If the Tribune is right, cannot this procurer and persecutor be punished under his own law or some other? We confess that since the government has abandoned the principle of the inviolability of the mails, we are prepared to hear of anything under the system of espionage established. Will the Tribune giv us more light on these questions?—Worthington Advance.

Events of the Week.

GLADSTONE is again at the head of the English government.

MORE than one hundred and twenty lives were lost by the recent storm at Marshfield, Mo.

A DEFAULTING tax-collector from Georgia recently committed suicide at Los Angeles, Cal.

NAVIGATION on the Erie Canal was recently stopped for ten days by a break at West Utica.

THE King of Siam and his shipload of servants, now on the way to Europe, will visit this country.

THE five thousand strikers at Cohoes, New York, hav returned to work. Concessions were made on both sides.

A TUGBOAT in New Orleans exploded its boiler on the 25th, killing one man and severely injuring several others.

TWO MEN were hanged in St. Louis, Mo., on the 23d ult., one of them for wife-murder. They both died good Catholics.

KEARNEY, the agitator, who was released on a writ of habeas corpus, has been remanded to prison to serve out his sentence.

A BOY only twelve years of age committed suicide in Paterson, N. J., a few days ago, because he was compelled to do housework.

A STORM in Macon, Miss., on the 25th ult., killed 17 persons and injured 22. Houses were blown down and cars blown from the track.

THE straw shops of the Hills Manufacturing Company, in Amherst, Massachusetts, were destroyed by fire on the 23d ult. Loss, $100,000.

A TERRIBLE famine is prevailing in Mesopotamia and Kurdistan. Immense numbers of the starving sufferers are flocking into Bagdad.

THE English army in Afghanistan recently had a terrible encounter with the natives, in which more than a thousand Afghans were killed.

THE crew of a life boat, six persons, were drowned while trying to save the crew of a wrecked vessel near Huron City, Mich., on the 23d ult.

SIX persons were killed and fifteen or twenty injured by the falling of part of the building known as Gilmore's Garden, in this city, on the 21st ult. A charity fair was in progress at the time. Flimsy building was the cause of the accident.

THREE thousand four hundred immigrants arrived at this port on Saturday last. The rush of immigration is now so great that the railroad companies are dispatching special immigrant trains for the West. Over thirty-five thousand immigrants landed in this city during the month of April.

UPWARDS of two hundred Newfoundland fishermen, who had ventured some distance from shore on an ice-floe in pursuit of seals a short time since, were carried out to sea by the breaking up of the floe. Some of the fishermen were rescued by passing vessels, but it is feared the majority hav starved or frozen to death or been drowned. Some of the rescued endured horrible sufferings before they were taken from the ice.

CHARLES DE YOUNG, editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, was shot and killed in his office on the 23d ult. by the Rev. I. M. Kalloch, son of the clerical adulterer who is now mayor of San Francisco. De Young is the man who shot but failed to kill Kalloch, Sr. before his election to office, for his outrageous assault on the character of the mother of the De Young family. The cause of the present shooting is said to be certain investigations De Young had been making into the past history of the Kallochs, father and son, with a view to publication. The shooting was deliberate and apparently premeditated. Kalloch is in prison.

Tenth Letter from Albany.

PENITENTIARY, April 25, 1880.

MY DEAR FRIENDS AND READERS: It is now within four days of the time when locks and bolts and bars are to detain me no longer, and when I can walk forth in the sunshine and pure air as free as any of you. Yes, before these lines shall fall under the eye of the larger portion of you, I will undoubtedly be at home once more with my dear wife and kind friends. As I am permitted, while still here, to write you one more letter I cheerfully avail myself of the privilege, and add this to the nine which have preceded it. It has been a privilege and a pleasure to me to address you once in four weeks—one of the few pleasures I have had to boast of—but it has been a still greater pleasure to receive letters from you, bringing me the assurance that you still sympathize with me and regard me as a friend and brother though my Christian and self-righteous enemies were doing their utmost to crush and ruin me.

Yes, my friends, these letters which you have written me in large numbers have been exceedingly comforting to me, and have done very much to lighten and alleviate the weeks and months of gloomy imprisonment which I have been compelled to endure. Often have I re-read them, and still more often have I remembered them and treasured in my heart the words of kindness and sympathy which they contain. If my lot has seemed hard, and if the feeling that I was the victim of hatred and injustice came over me, I have remembered your words of confidence and good cheer. I have fully realized that though you were absent in body you were with me in spirit, and though I could not see you with my eyes nor reach you with my hands, you really were not far away, and that you were helping me to tread the wine-press of sorrow and oppression which for many months it has been my lot to tread. If I have sometimes almost felt your presence here in my prison-house with me, it is not strange, for I knew your thoughts were with me, and that many of you would willingly help me to serve out my sentence if the powers that placed me here would allow such vicarious atonement—the principle of which they pretend to believe in—to be applied in my case. I wish to take this opportunity to sincerely thank every one of you who have written me since I have been in prison. I think few prisoners in the world's history have received so many excellent letters. They have cheered the gloom that has surrounded me. They have afforded comfort where little comfort is to be found. To those of you who have written me repeatedly I feel grateful in proportion, and wish you to accept an increased share of my gratitude. And to those who have written me every week, as some of you have, I am under a deeper obligation than I know how to pay; but please be assured that I fully appreciate your kindnesses and can never forget them. I thank you with the sincerest feeling my organization is capable of. I know no way of repaying you only by writing something to you every week for as long a period as you have written to me; and, to make sure of your getting the same, to print them in THE TRUTH SEEKER. But while on the subject, let me again and again thank you all. I thank every one of you who has cherished a kindly feeling, a spirit of friendship, of sympathy, and of charity, even if you have not written me a word. I know there are thousands of such scattered over this broad land. You are dear to the finer and better feelings of my nature. My heart goes out to you in gratitude and love. I am proud to be numbered with you, and trust we may ever be fast and true friends. I would most gladly clasp you by the hand and feel the kindly, genial magnetism that I know wells up in your very hearts, so to speak. I regard you as the salt of the earth; it is my prayer (Theodore Parker said, "The only prayer that amounts to anything is effort") that this preserving, saving quality may greatly increase on the earth. For this I will struggle and toil so long as I have life and strength. Reason, truth, and knowledge are the agencies that will produce the result, and these we will all strive to increase. I repeat, I would gladly have replied to the many kind letters I have received from you since I have been shut out from the world, but the rules of the prison would not allow it. So, dear friends, please "take the will for the deed."

As the day of my liberation is now so near, you can easily understand that I must be in a cheerful spirit, and that I feel just like expressing my gratitude to all who have extended kindness and favors to me. Yes, this seems to me a fitting time to return thanks. Let me begin, then, with the officers of this prison. I wish first to thank Superintendent John McEwen. He has treated me kindly since I hav been in this institution, and has made it as pleasant for me as the rules of the place will permit. He needs not my indorsement, but I take pleasure in assuring you that he is a gentleman of worth and integrity. I wish in a special degree to acknowledge my indebtedness to his excellent wife, Mrs. Margaret McEwen, and his daughter, Mrs. Martha Van Allen, for kindnesses they have shown me since I have been a prisoner here. I am indebted to them for many little comforts I have received, for my health, and perhaps my life. I can never forget them. Their kindness has not been shown to me alone, but to many unfortunate prisoners, particularly those sick and suffering. Previous to last year, according to the information I have received, but one woman visited this hospital for thirty years; and during that time hundreds of poor hapless men, old, young, and middle-aged, separated from families and friends, some justly, some unjustly, have here breathed their last without one to administer one little comfort or kindness to them, or hardly to speak a sympathizing word. Since Col. McEwen took charge of this establishment, on March 1, 1879, a different system has been pursued here. The two ladies named have at least two or three times a week visited the hospital of the prison, and by kind words and various little comforts and attentions calculated to soothe and palliate sickness and suffering have administered such consolation—such rays of cheerful sunshine—as sick and dying men can duly appreciate, and such as females know best how to dispense. It is not strange that the sick men in the hospital regarded them as ministering angels, and so called them. It is perhaps those who for long months and years have been debarred from female society, the affectionate offices of a mother, a wife, a sister, a daughter, or a friend, can best appreciate such kindness and attentions as those know best how to administer. I have seen the good effects of these kindnesses. I have felt them, and can speak with experimental knowledge of the influence which kindness exerts, even on poor, despised, and forsaken convicts. The two ladies named accept the claims of the Christian religion (though I believe they are members of no church), but I appreciate the generous deeds they have performed as much as though they were the most advanced Liberals. I sincerely thank them for the good deeds they have done.

I would also duly acknowledge thanks to Deputy-Superintendent Powers and Clerk Bowers. They spoke harshly to me when I made my debut here and for a few days thereafter—unnecessarily so, I thought—but since we have become better acquainted they have treated me as kindly as prison discipline permits. The latter has been more officious and persistent in mutilating the letters that have been sent me, obliterating such lines and words as he deemed might injure my juvenile mind, keeping parts of some letters from me and others altogether, to an extent I think wholly unnecessary, but as he is a good zealous deacon of the Baptist church, due allowance should be made for what, perhaps, he deems a kindness or a duty to an ungodly Infidel. He also has unkindly sent away several dear friends who called to see me, without permitting them to do so. I feel grateful to nearly all the officers, keepers, and overseers of the prison with whom I have become acquainted. They have been uniformly as kind and respectful to me as the rules allow of.

I have reason to be grateful to William Geoghan, M.D., the prison physician. He was kind and attentive to me when sick, and has been kind and courteous in all cases. He is a "birthright" Catholic, but he says he will read my forthcoming "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," on which conditions I shall present him with a copy. I return thanks to Dr. Geoghan, and shall long hold his kindness in remembrance. I shall also cherish the memory of the Rev. Charles Reynolds and Father Maurice Bierl, the two chaplains of the prison, the former a Protestant, the latter a Catholic. They have frequently visited the hospital since I have been an inmate of it, and have treated me with marked kindness and courtesy. We have had many spirited discussions upon theological subjects, but in a kindly spirit. They have listened to my strictures upon the faith they hold dear without becoming offended, while I have enjoyed their replies, especially when I fancied I had the best of the argument and had made a good hit. I commend Mr. Reynolds for the good practical work he is doing in his outside efforts. He is superintendent of a city mission; he has superintended the erection of the building for the purpose, in which is a free reading-room, a cheap restaurant where newsboys and any poor person can get a comfortable meal for from five to ten cents, and lodging in proportion. In the upper part is a hall or lecture-room where free lectures and preaching are held once or twice a week. In connection he has organized a course of instruction on plain and practical cooking, for poor girls, as well as an intelligence office for obtaining situations for those needing them. I have told him that I approve of the practical part of his Christianity more than the theoretical, especially that part that has so much to say about the merits of the blood of Jesus, and his great offices as the savior of the world. Father Maurice is an educated German, of unusual fairness, candor, geniality, and courtesy, for a clergyman, and I have found I could learn much on various subjects in conversing with him. He has more than once acknowledged the strength of my arguments; but I had little expectation of converting either of the gentlemen named to my views. The latter was raised and educated to the priesthood, and perhaps would be illy fitted for other avocations in life, which he doubtless appreciates. Mr. Reynolds was formerly a lawyer, as he informs me, but getting too full of the "love of Jesus" to just fit him for that profession, he became a Methodist clergyman. With his salary as chaplain, and what he makes in his other enterprises, I learn he realizes some $2,500 per year—more, probably, than the law paid him. It is sometimes not easy to convert people in opposition to their financial interests.

I have more thanks to bestow. First among those in the outside world I must name my faithful and devoted wife. Her affection and sympathy has been as constant as the sun. She has written me every few days. She has made the journey here repeatedly to see me and cheer me. She also made the journey to Washington when she thought my health was giving way, and obtained an interview with the acting President, with whom she earnestly pleaded that he would release me, but with what effect you all well know. He gave her to understand that if the physician of the prison would make a statement in reference to my impaired health, he would liberate me. The statement was made and sent. But the church spoke after that—even after instructions had been given for a pardon to be made out, and ordered him not to giv me liberty, and their behests were more potent with his Fraudulency than money or justice. My wife has daily attended to duty in THE TRUTH SEEKER office (except when absent on the services alluded to), even though her health was a part of the time so feeble as almost to prevent it. She not only deserves my undying gratitude, but the thanks of all my Liberal friends.

There is another to whom I feel especially indebted. It is Elder G. A. Lomas, editor of the Shaker Manifesto. He has been a true and constant friend during my incarceration. He resides in the Shaker community, seven miles from this city, and he has made me regular and repeated visits, always bringing cheerfulness and sunshine with him, and frequently, too, such eatables as he knew would be acceptable. He has also kindly written many letters to friends in different parts of the country, to whom I could not write, informing them of my condition, and how I was getting along from time to time, and has forwarded to me many letters from friends directed to his care. Other Shaker friends have often called to see me with Elder Lomas, all of whom I have been very glad to see. They have known me for nearly half a century, I having passed a part of my boyhood days, my youth, and early manhood in their Mount Lebanon society; and though I "fell off from the faith," though I became a "backslider," yes, "an apostate," they have retained a friendly feeling for me since I left them in the year 1846 up to the present time. I have frequently visited them in the intervening years, and have kept up a certain degree of friendly intercourse. I can truthfully affirm that I prize their friendship, their purity, their constancy, their integrity. I know them well, and am fully convinced a more sincere, upright, virtuous, and pure-minded people does not live upon the earth. I assure you, my friends, it has been a decided consolation to me that these good people, these friends of my youth, have been unwavering in their friendship for me, though many self-righteous hypocrites, slanderers, and falsifiers have done their utmost to blacken my character in the eyes of the world. In this connection please excuse me—and I trust Elder Lomas will excuse me also—for laying before you a letter which the Elder recently wrote to the man in the White House at Washington, and in my behalf. It was not written for the public eye, nor with any expectation even that I would see it, but by special request my friend sent it me. It is not the first of the letters he has written to the same party, this, I think, being the third or fourth of similar tenor:

SHAKERS, N. Y., March 19, 1880.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY,
R. B. HAYES, PRESIDENT:

Once more, my dear President, I come beseechingly, asking your kindly consideration for the pardon of my friend, D. M. Bennett, in the Albany Penitentiary, now suffering the last months of more than a year's sentence, which myself and his hundreds of thousands of petitioners verily believe to have been one of the most unjust of sentences. Our friend, Mr. President, is an old man, but we have known him personally for more than thirty years to be above the reproach of an intentional unprincipled act. Ere his full term expires, will you not do us, his firm friends, the favor of his partial pardon? He has been most severely punished, even had he been guilty of the unjust charge. We, as Shakers, cannot think of you as capable of committing an irreparable wrong purposely. We would think of you as we have of our dear personal friends—Lincoln, Seward, Stanton, and Wade, to whom we never made application in vain for executive interference. Hoping at this late day you will pass by any efforts that run counter to his friends' petitions, and that I may have the high honor of bearing to him the glad tidings of the President's pardon,

I am yours, etc,
G. A. LOMAS.

This lettter was forwarded to Senator Roscoe Conkling, with the request that he would transmit it to the President. The Senator acknowledged the receipt of it, and said it had been duly forwarded to the President. And yet it was like the dropping of gentle rain on the hide of an alligator—of no effect whatever. Although this representative of sixteen Shaker communities, numbering three thousand people, requested the present head of the government, in the most feeling and deferential language, to shorten my unjust imprisonment, even by a few weeks, asking him to not suffer the counter-efforts of enemies to longer influence him, still all was in vain. Although Mr. Hayes has himself admitted that I had committed no crime and that I was not deserving of imprisonment, he has proved himself to be callous to every influence touching my case, save the commands of the church and the commands of his wife, which, unfortunately, emanated from the same bigoted, intolerant source. I nevertheless sincerely thank my good friend Elder Lomas, and all the fraternity of Shakers, for the efforts they have made in my behalf and for the unswerving friendship they have shown me. I shall endeavor to prove myself worthy of their continued good will.

Let me take this occasion to inform you that Elder Lomas attended our chapel meeting this morning, and upon being introduced by Mr. Reynolds he spoke to us prisoners about half an hour in a very candid, impressive manner. He said he came more to hear Mr. Reynolds than with the expectation of speaking himself, but he regarded as it his privilege on all occasions to follow the example of the good master who went about from place to place healing the sick, curing the lame and afflicted, visiting those in despondency, and doing good to all. Without stopping to consider the means by which we had been brought together this morning, he recognized the great truth that we are all brothers and sisters in humanity, and that in each and every one of us there is a portion of divinity, not only binding us together, but also uniting us to the source of all goodness and truth. He appealed to the better part of our natures to let the enforced separation from the world, which we were compelled to submit to, the prison life we were now leading, serve as a reformatory means to make us better men and women. He advised us all to improve the hours, while we are locked in our lonely cells, to meditate upon the necessity of close watchfulness, good resolutions, and self-denial in our future lives, so that when the doors of the prison are opened for us to step out and be again free, we may be better men and women than ever before. In that way, the ignominy and pain and deprivation we are now enduring will prove, instead of a curse, a blessing to us. He said many illustrious persons had been compelled to submit to a prison life and an enforced separation from their fellow-men. He instanced first, John, the revelator, who was confined on the Isle of Patmos, where he wrote a remarkable and most interesting book. Next John Bunyan, who, while he was immured within prison walls, wrote a most valued work which had been perused with profit by thousands, and probably millions. He hoped none would sink in discouragement, and think all chances had passed for being moral and upright, and for doing good and leading good lives. He congratulated all present upon the condition of health we were enjoying, and the portion of the divine nature which all possessed There were none but what had something of the good about them. This he hoped all would increase and strengthen, loving not only the divine element, but loving each other, and all of the human family. He hoped when we left these prison walls we would do so fully resolved to lead good lives in the future, and to give offense to none. He spoke much more in the same line. He addressed us in a very kind spirit, and his remarks were kindly received.

Mr. Reynolds next introduced a Mr. Lee, who had been a prisoner in different prisons for ten years, and though he had once been hunted by sheriffs and constables, had now become a good man. The gentleman addressed us in a very earnest manner, giving us to understand that for six years he had left all evil-doing behind, and for four years he had been talking for Jesus, preaching the gospel in this state, in the East, in the West, and in Canada. He had a good deal to say about Jesus, and gave him the credit for the reformation he had made. His principal advice to us was to call upon Jesus and request his aid to become believers in him. But let me return:

In this connection, I wish to give you another letter to the President from another dear friend of mine and a college classmate of the Executive himself. I am tolerably well assured the writer did not wish it published; but the history of this whole case is being written, and this forms a part of it. I trust my friend will pardon me for laying this letter before my readers:

HYDE PARK, MASS., Feb., 23, 1880.

TO PRESIDENT HAYES, Honored Sir: The New York TRUTH SEEKER of Feb, 21, 1880 contained a letter from its editor, Mr. D M. Bennett, now in the Albany Penitentiary, addressed to yourself, asking to withdraw all requests heretofore made to you by himself, his wife, friends, and citizens, petitioners for his release from imprisonment.

I write now to say that I have been and am now a petitioner for him, and I do not wish my former letter and petition in his behalf withdrawn, notwithstanding his request to that effect. On the contrary, more earnestly than ever do I ask for his release. He is not a criminal. He has done nothing worthy of imprisonment. He, as many a good man and martyr for truth before has been, is, as I believe, the victim of religious zeal and polemic hatred (and hatred is always blind), excited against him by his frequent bold avowals, discussions, and publication of certain religious opinions, as editor of an Infidel and Freethought newspaper.

Have not he and his friends now suffered sufficiently in his imprisonment to this time to mitigate the anger of his enemies?

Please consider how slight the charge which is the pretext for his imprisonment. He sent a pamphlet discussion of certain social relations between the sexes, through the United States mail, to Anthony Comstock in response to his payment and request for the pamphlet.

Mr. Bennett's continued incarceration is, as I believe, a crime against liberty and intelligence, against a valued and sacred right of the people, that of free speech and a free press. It is, as it appears to me, a peace-offering, a sop, as it were, to ignorance, intolerance, and superstition, and is a daily disgrace to the good name of our country.

Please pardon me if I also suggest that when you, I, and other young men, were students in Harvard Law School, years ago, we there listened not only to lectures on law from Professor Greenleaf, but to admirable lectures on equity from the beloved and learned Judge Story.

May I now express my belief that the immediate and unconditional pardon of Mr. Bennett would be a deed of mercy—of equity—probably would be regarded by many good and wise people at home and abroad as simply an act of justice to Mr. Bennett, and will be acknowledged by future historians as highly creditable to the President.

With sentiments of esteem, I am

Very respectfully yours,

ALFRED E. GILES.

But even such a reasonable request as this had no effect upon a man who obtained his position by fraud, and has sold himself to the powers of ecclesiastical bigotry, intolerance, and persecution. I am informed that many thousand similar letters—besides the petition with 200,000 names—have been sent to the occupant of the White House, asking him to perform this simple act of justice and mercy, but without the slightest effect. The church obtained his ear, and told him what he must do. Friends have sent me copies of such letters, many of them eloquent and touching, but they were written previous to my letter to Mr. Hayes, asking him to withdraw all such applications, and I shall not introduce them now. Never has a president of this government been appealed to with so much feeling and urgency, and by such a great number of people, to perform an act of justice that a good man would cheerfully perform without being urged; but never has a president shown such utter heartlessness and criminal indifference. He has been deaf to the appeals of the merciful, the upright, and the just, and has listened to the behests of unprincipled hypocrites, merciless bigots, and intolerant persecutors. This is the record R B. Hayes has made for himself. This is the history of this case, which will stand for centuries to come.

As I have made rather free with private letters, giving you such as perhaps I should not, I will venture to present you one more which I received a few days ago from a long-time intimate friend, one who probably knows me as well as any man living, and one whom I know to be strictly honest and just. Twenty years ago we together attended the radical discourses of Moncure D. Conway (now in London), in the Unitarian church which then stood on the corner of Fourth and Race streets, Cincinnati. It was then we became acquaintances and friends; and as we resided in the same part of the city, we leisurly walked homewards, commenting on what we had heard. Free discussions on religious subjects were held in the same church, and were participated in by able speakers and advanced thinkers. These were particularly interesting to my friend Winterburn and myself (he was once a clergyman), and we compared notes and opinions very freely. I may add we usually arrived at a unanimous conclusion. Dr. Winterburn very often visited my place of business, where we passed scores of hours—in the aggregate—in radical and scientific discourse. He removed to New York before I did, but we readily renewed our former intimate friendship, which I doubt not will continue so long as we continue. I am proud of him as a friend, and it does me good to be assured that such men, who know me so well, find something in me to commend, when so many who have known so little of me are denouncing me in unmeasured terms. If his expressions seem a trifle enthusiastic or extravagant, please remember his letter was not written for the public eye, but simply my own; but as it is most gratifying to my feelings I wish to share it with you.

229 W. 22ND ST., NEW YORK, April 10, 1880.

MY GOOD AND DEAR OLD FRIEND, D. M. BENNETT:—Unless I write you now I shall not be permitted to do so, for in about half a moon, as the Indian would say, you will be here face to face It seems an age since we met, or, rather, parted last. Our next meeting will be a time to be always remembered. You will have made a long page of history for the church and the world. Your name will go down the line of time for ages. Bennett of THE TRUTH SEEKER will rank among many of the world's famous men—not for what he has done, only, but for what he has suffered. He has made the cause holy for which he has suffered. He has suffered martyrdom as much as those who were burnt at Smithfield, or were drowned at Salem, and did it like Cranmer, the most heroic of them all.

We await your arrival at your home with joy. We expect to ring the jubilee bells of freedom on your return to us, and let your persecutors know that you are not dead nor sleeping, but that you will come forth like the fabled three Hebrew children from the fiery furnace, victorious, unharmed by the persecution, and without the smell of fire upon your person or a blot upon your character.

I knew you twenty years ago. I thought you were grand then. Now I know you to be the true steel of the Damascus kind; you can bend without a break, and stand like the beaten anvil to the stroke, and ask, "Where are my accusers now?" Thousands, my dear, good friend Bennett, will welcome you back again; will smile on your benign face, and love you better than ever. They will try to make the remainder of your life an Indian summer, cloudless and cheerful, blessed and a blessing to your friends and the world.

Three weeks from to-day, all being well, I shall have you by your pen hand—that weapon of powerful energy and might—and shake it as I never did before, and bid it make bolder and more defiant attacks on the foes of free speech, a free press, and free mails. I am always your friend,

CHARLES WINTERBURN, M.D.

P. S.—I see by the late London News that our friend Chas. Bradlaugh has been elected to a seat in the Parliament of England. So Liberalism looks up even there. He will be heard from in behalf of human rights. C. W.

Upon the receipt of such a kind letter, I could not do less than drop my friend a line; and as I am already guilty of a breach of confidence in his case, I believe I will be still more guilty and give you a part of his in reply, which I received to-day:

NEW YORK, April 23, 1880.

A LAST WORD TO MY GOOD OLD FRIEND WHILE HE IS IN PRISON AT ALBANY:

Yours of the 14th came duly to hand. Was very glad to hear from you. To know that you felt kindly to me was no surprise; but it is nice, you know, to hear it said or see it written. We have heads and hearts to feed as well as stomachs, and it is not vanity to attend to the feeding of one more than the other.

The 29th of April, 1880, will be a red-letter day in my calendar henceforth—one of more importance than any thus marked in the prayer book. We'll all take a hand in keeping up this remembrance of its return in all future years. It means D. M. Bennett's return from the lion's den; Jonah's escape from the whale's stomach; Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego from the fiery furnace. It will be your resurrection day—an Easter Sunday in the calendar of the future, "for we are," as Lincoln said, "making history which cannot be rubbed out."

I am pleased to know that your physical health is good and that our enemies will be disappointed on your return to your home and business—ready to give them battle for human rights and human freedom. Few men at your time of life could have withstood the pressure so well as you have done. Few would have come out alive after such a long imprisonment.

Comstock, Crosby, Colgate, with Benedict, Britton, and Hayes, may hide their shameless faces from the scorn and contempt of the age.

Friend Bennett, the world is alive just as you left it. The sun rises and sets, the week comes and goes, and so does man. How many noted men have died since you went up to Albany! Amongst the many, Dr. Osgood died last Wednesday in a few moments. Dr. Hutton of Washington Square church; he also went in a few minutes. I could mention the names of many prominent men who have passed away within the last six months, while you and I are full of life and vim. I hope some time to come.

I see your boys [TRUTH SEEKER printers] once in a while, and your good wife always welcomes me with cheer. How your advent makes her smile, poor woman. She has done nobly—acted her part well. She must have her comfort yet in this world. You see I am no pessimist; I am not worldtired yet. But here I must stop. I'm off to New Jersey to see a patient. I've lots to say when we meet.

Yours always kindly,

CHARLES WINTERBURN, M.D.

P. S. This is my sixty fifth birthday. Born in 1815, on April 23d. I did not think of it when I began to write.

W.

How can I help feeling grateful for such friendship and the expressions of such confidence and esteem? A large number of the letters I have received since I have been in prison are of the same class, many of which I would like to print, but I do not wish in that way to sound my own praises too loudly. My principal desire is to show while I have most bitter and malicious enemies, I have also warm and appreciative friends. I would at any time give more for one true friend than half a dozen of the bitterest foes.

I have scores of letters similar to the one last given that I would gladly lay before you, friendly, appreciate letters from such friends as Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, Dr. E B. Foote, Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, A. L Rawson, E E. Gibson, Mrs. Elizabeth M. F. Denton, Henry Damon, Mrs. Sallie J. Miner, John S. Verity, Mrs. Mary Emma Fisher, E C. Walker, Mrs. Olive K. Smith, James Johnson, Mrs. A. H. Colby, A. H. Walker, Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn, W. S. Bell, Mrs. Leroy Dutton, L. A. Thompson, Mrs. Amy Post, Jay Chappel, Mrs. Jennie E Leete, E. H. Heywood, Mrs. H. S. Lake, Moses Hull, Mrs. Dr. Andrews, H. A. Stone, Mrs. Dr. Raymond, E. Campfield, Mrs. Grace L. Parkhurst, Frank Rivers, Mrs. Maggie E Clark, T. C. Leland, Lizzie Adams, Daniel E. Ryan, Mrs. Winnie Aspinwall, R. M. Casey, Mrs. Libbie Decker, I. C. Terry, and hosts of others, all of which would doubtless interest you to read, but I cannot introduce them now; you will, however, believe me when I assure you I prize them most highly. I repeat, very few prisoners have received such a quantity of most excellent letters, and from such a great number of friends, scattered over such a great extent of country.

There are large numbers of you, my friends, whom I would be very glad to take by the hand and thank personally for your remembrance of me when in affliction. Yes, I would gladly have replied to your kind letters, but the rules of the prison would not permit it. Let me again thank you all.

But there are some for whom I have no thanks. Curses, perhaps, would be more fitting for some of them, but I deal not much in curses, and so will not use them now. I have no thanks for Anthony Comstock. I regard him one of the vilest and meanest men that live. How does the case stand between him and myself? For nearly a year I have been lying in prison, by his procuring, on the ignominious charge of circulating obscene literature—Mr. Heywood's little argumentative pamphlet on a most vital question which affects every human being; a pamphlet written with the best of motives, containing not one improper word or thought, but arguments and suggestions which thousands of excellent people have read with profit, many thinking the arguments unanswerable. The little work has been sold by the thousand both before and since my conviction, and read by hundreds of thousands, and I do not believe one person, old or young, has received the slightest injury from reading it. I am not afraid to offer a handsome premium for any person that can be produced who, in the slightest degree, has been damaged by reading "Cupid's Yokes." Yet for mailing one copy of it to a false address I have been sent to prison.

The only obscene book I remember having seen for twenty years is one that came from Anthony Comstock. It was sent by mail to a person of my acquaintance. That it did come from Comstock can be proved to the full satisfaction of every intelligent, impartial person. He has the main bulk of obscene literature in the country, which he captured some eight or ten years ago, which did not cost him a cent, and which he takes great pleasure in exhibiting to the pure minded clergy, pure-minded Congressmen, legislators, editors, etc. These books are illustrated by the vilest cuts ever made. Comstock gloats over these. He has spent hours, days, and weeks in perusing them, looking at the foul pictures, showing them to his very pious pulpit friends, and lugging them around to Congress, the legislatures, and to religious gatherings of the clergy and leading church-members in various parts of the country. These books and prints Comstock, through his man Friday—Britton—has offered for sale to numerous bookdealers, and many persons believe he has sent large numbers by mail. That he sent one I have positive proof. If any person of depraved tastes and impure mind wants an obscene book with the very worst illustrations, Anthony Comstock is the man to send to. He has monopolized the business. He has all the stock in the market. He has "made a corner" in obscenity. His office, and the office of his obscene society, is at 150 Nassau street, New York, over the American Tract Society. I am told there is so much obscenity there that it can be smelt in the air and be almost sliced with a knife. Comstock is soaked, steeped, impregnated, saturated, filled up, pressed down, and running over with obscenity. Some fancy they can see obscenity coming out of his mouth, nose, and eyes. I think I have seen it in his face (and his is one of the most coarse, sensual-looking physiognomies I ever looked upon). He—member of Dr. Storr's church—has probably devoted more time to poring over obscene filth than any fifty men in the country, always excepting his very pure-minded aid-de-camp and assistant, Joseph A. Britton, member of Chrystie-street Methodist church. What these two men do not know about obscenity and nastiness can never be found out. They have some of it with them at all times. It is said they never can be found without an obscene book or a six-shooter with them. The effect of those filthy books and pictures, which Comstock carries around with him to Congress, to gatherings of sainted clergymen, and which he exhibits to invited guests in his office, is most electrical. After they have pored over the vile stuff for half an hour and listened to Anthony's lies about how such books are being sent through the mails by tons to all the little schoolgirls in the country, they immediately come to the conclusion that there is indeed a Saint Anthony of modern times, and they instantly fall down, metaphorically speaking, and worship him. They remember him and his pictures, lo, many days. In his recent-called meeting of very pious men in Chicago, it seems some of the beloved pure men who expected to enjoy the usual Comstock exhibition called for some of his pretty pictures. His saintly reply was, "Oh, you could not look at them without being badly infected and defiled." "But," was the rejoinder, "how happens it that you do not become defiled, who see so much of it?" "Oh," answered the saint, very sanctimoniously, "it is only by prayer that I am protected." Prayer! Such a thing as he pray! As though any decent god or devil would listen to him if he did! As well might maggots, worms, turkey-buzzards, crows, and vultures, who live on and bloat and gorge themselves with the foulest carrion, claim that they prevent the filth from striking in and defiling them "by means of prayer!" Bah!

But Comstock does not obtain from his obscene pictures and books all the foul pabulum his mind craves. He wants also the living, breathing, palpitating article. Let it not be forgotten that on the 14th day of June, 1878, he went to a house of prostitution at No. 224 Greene street, in New York city, and for a certain sum of money hired three unfortunate frail girls to exhibit themselves in a state of entire nudity, before himself and five other men. He was master of ceremonies, and for an hour and twenty minutes, as testified to in Judge Gildersleeve's court, ordered those girls through various evolutions and performances, unfit to be named, until his unclean mind was doubtless fully satisfied for the time. On another occasion he took prostitutes to the photograph gallery of Mr. Rice, on Broadway and Twelfth street, for the express purpose of having their pictures taken in a state of nudity. This is Anthony Comstock. This is the man who caused me to be thrown into a felon's cell for thirteen months, for obscenity, while he remains at large, petted and feted by the pious, self-righteous hypocrites, little better than himself. The vilest harlot that walks the streets of New York at midnight is not more vile and corrupt than that man Comstock. If I have been guilty enough of obscenity to send me to prison a year, a thousand years would not suffice to give him his just deserts. Yes, this is the man who dragged off to prison, on his foul charges, such excellent old men as Leonard Fox, M. Weil, Andrew Prosch, and others. Oh, will that man ever receive the meed of retribution justly due him? No, I have no thanks for him.

I have no thanks for Charles L. Benedict, who has prostituted the high office of Judge of a United States Court to carry out the narrow and cruel behests of the powers of sectarian bigotry, intolerance, and malice. He is a genuine disciple of John Calvin. It is of him that Comstock often has boasted, especially at the time of my trial. In the court room, and while the jury were out trying to agree upon a verdict, "Ah," said Comstock, "I never fail in this court; I always win my cases before Judge Benedict; I invariably meet with success here." And it was this Judge's sentence of myself to this prison that gave Comstock most exquisite pleasure (I believe that was the occasion). At Cincinnati, before a called meeting of clergymen and others, in the parlor of the Burnett House, Comstock held up the dispatch he had received, and said to this effect: "Ah, my friends, this is the happiest day of my life! That bad man, Bennett, is sent to prison, at which I greatly rejoice!"

Judge Benedict gave me a most unfair trial—a mere travesty of justice. I wished to show, by most competent writers, scholars, philologists, experts, and booksellers, that Mr. Heywood's pamphlet is not obscene. Benedict would not allow it. I wished to have the pamphlet of twenty-three pages read entirely to the jury. Benedict forbade it. I wished to compare the little pamphlet with the writings of standard authors of works on physiology, philosophy, and general literature. Benedict would not allow it. I wished to show by the author of the pamphlet what his purpose was in writing it, and that he had not the slightest intention of inflaming or exciting anybody's passions. Benedict stopped this. I wished to show to the jury the animus of the man who had instituted the prosecution against me—that he had threatened to break up my business; that he had on several occasions tried, by threats of imprisonment, to intimidate the printers who printed my paper and books, and prevent their doing further work for me; that he had tried the same tactics with the news companies, threatening them with prosecution if they did not stop selling my papers. In the same way he tried to prevent the folder and mailer from handling my paper, the post-office people from sending it away, and the newsdealers and newsboys from selling it on the streets. But Benedict would let nothing of the kind be shown. I wished to show to the jury that Comstock perjured himself in three instances in the testimony he gave on my trial. Witnesses to do this were in the room, and two of them called to the stand, but Benedict would not let the facts be told. All his rulings and decisions were pointedly and persistently against me, and when he came to his charge to the jury he did it in such a way that if they obeyed him they could not help bringing in a verdict of guilty. He gave such instructions as would send to prison every bookseller in the country. I have compared Benedict with the infamous Jefferies of the sixteenth century. I think the comparison just, though possibly rather severe on Jefferies. It is a sad thought to think that five or six thousand dollars of the people's money has to be used in paying Benedict for enacting gross injustice. I believe the worst act of Lincoln's life was to make a judge of Charles L. Benedict. It is only charitable to Lincoln to believe he did not know the real character of the man he was thus elevating for life. Had he known this it cannot be thought he would ever have made such an appointment. No, no thanks for Benedict!

I have no thanks and no great respect for Judges Blatchford and Choate, inasmuch as being called to review my trial as appellate judges, though sitting at the time with Benedict, they sustained him in all his iniquitous rulings, unjust charges, etc. Benedict was really on trial himself, and brother Calvinists sustained him, refused me a new trial, and sent an innocent man to prison. An Infidel can hardly expect much mercy or much justice where religious prejudices are aroused, when he has to depend upon the tender mercies of three Calvinistic judges, a Calvinistic prosecutor, and principally a Calvinistic jury, especially when a Calvinistic church has issued an edict that he must be convicted. Not one of these judges is in this case deserving of the thanks of the lovers of justice.

I have no thanks for Stewart L. Woodford, the district attorney who sanctioned proceedings against me and signed the indictment arraigning me on a false charge. He knew I had committed no crime and that I was not deserving of imprisonment, but in obedience to the voice of the church he winked at injustice and gave his aid toward depriving me of the dearest rights I had in the world. He did what he knew to be wrong to please the rich, churchly, self-righteous class. Verily he has his reward. He once told me, in his own office, after he had read my "Thirty Discussions," etc., that I was a more honest man than himself. I think he was honest then, if he never was at any other time. He certainly was not honest when he unjustly took steps to wrest from me, by the power of the United States government that which is dearer to me than life. He was very ready to prosecute myself, but he utterly refused to prosecute Samuel Colgate who had positively broken the same statute under which I was tried and imprisoned. The difference was, I am an Infidel and a poor man, while the other was a leading Christian and a man of wealth. This is Christian justice. No thanks for Woodford.

No thanks for William P. Fiero, assistant district attorney, bosom friend of and co-operater with Anthony Comstock. He secured my conviction fully as much on my "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" as for mailing "Cupid's Yokes." He prosecuted me with all the vigor he possessed and held me up as a vile, bad man. I cannot thank him for that.

I have no thanks for the Christian jury which sent me here. They did not find a common sense, righteous verdict, but allowed their religious prejudices and bigotry to have full weight against me. They are worthy of comdemnation, but not thanks. May they never receive such unjust treatment at the hands of their fellow-men.

I have no thanks for Samuel Colgate. He is far more a violator of the statute under which I am imprisoned than I am. He advertised and sent the advertisement by mail how salicylic acid, blended with vaseline, would prevent conception. He had the vaseline for sale. His was a positive breach of the law, while mine was only constructively so, calling that obscene which is not obscene. Colgate presented himself at my trial, giving his influence against me, and by his money he aids in crushing out the liberties and rights of men fully as good as himself. He often visits Comstock's obscene office, and probably regales his pure soul with the choice obscenity which is kept there in abundance. Colgate is worthy of no thanks.

No thanks to the Rev. Joseph Cook, who by a blunder on the part of some one escaped from a mad-house not long ago. He put in his gross, obese, flabby-looking person at my trial, side by side with his friend Comstock, to wield the jury by the weight of his lymph and vast saintly influence against me. He has also slandered me in the grossest manner since I have been in prison. As a pious clerical liar and defamer of Liberals he has no equal.

No thanks to the Rev. Howard Crosby, D D., L.L.D., A.S.S., etc. He is a bosom friend of Anthony Comstock. He approves of Anthony's lies, as he declared in a public meeting in the Young Men's Christian Association Hall; and there is every reason for believing he approves of Comstock's perjury and obscenity, for he says he "swears by Anthony Comstock." Crosby has a suppression society of his own, of a similar character to Comstock's obscene society, which perhaps is partly the reason of their close friendship. "A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind." I cannot thank Crosby for shamefully slandering me in the public meeting alluded to, denouncing me as a leader and defender of dealers in obscene literature, when his friend Comstock sees more of it in a minute than I ever saw in all my life. His slander is a vile falsehood. I cannot thank him nor respect him for exulting over my imprisonment, and uttering the immense falsehood that it was worth 100,000 times $50,000 or $5,000,000,000, being $15,000,000 per day, or $1,500,000 per hour, at ten hours per day. Probably that statement is just about as true as the big gospel stories he preaches.

I have no thanks for R. B Hayes and his pious wife, and for reasons already sufficiently stated. They have preferred to be merciless, relentless, and cruel, in obeying the commands of the church rather than listen to the dictates of humanity, mercy, and justice. It is my honest opinion that in every dollar he draws from the treasury of our country he commits a far greater crime than I did when one of my clerks deposited in the mail, duly stamped, one of Mr. Heywood's pamphlets. I had a perfect right to do what I did, while he has no right to draw the people's money. He was not elected to the position which he has disgraced. He obtained it by fraud and stealth.

I have no thanks for the orthodox clergy, my persistent foes, who have wilfully traduced me, and used the influence of their position to prevent Mr. Hayes from letting me out of prison when my health was giving way, and it was thought I could not live. Had I succumbed to the severity of prison life, as their influence kept me here, they would virtually have been my murderers. If they wish to persist in calling me "a bad man," I ask them to point out the bad deeds I am guilty of; to bring forward a person I have injured, either by wronging him out of a dollar, by telling a falsehood about him, or by depriving him of any rights he possesses. Let them point out any falsehood I have uttered at any time. It is not for uttering falsehood they hate me, but because I tell too much truth—truth damaging to their business and their plans for fleecing the people by exciting superstitious fears about angry gods and devils and smoking hells. Unless they can point out some absolute wrongs I have committed, some person I have injured, let them desist from slandering me, and speaking evil of me. If I have wronged a human being I do not know it, and did not intend it, while I am sure I can produce thousands who will testify that I have done them good.

There is another class of enemies who have co-operated with the foregoing in doing their utmost to render me all the injury in their power, and who seized upon the time when I was confined in a prison cell (unable to know what was being done or to make a defense for myself), to pour out such a flood of falsehood, slander, exaggeration, distortion malice, and venom as was never before showered upon one poor, luckless head at one time. Their treatment has felt far more cruel than my unjust trial and imprisonment. I have no thanks for those persons, though they claim to be Liberals. I honor and esteem all kinds of Liberals save this conservative, self-righteous, hypocritical, slandering class.

Excuse me, dear friends, for alluding to this unpleasant matter, but it is a part of the history of the wrongs that have been done me, and I do not wish to pass it unnoticed, though I hope to never have to allude to it again. I know not what I ever did to this class of pseudo-Liberals that they should have made such an unkind, such an ungentlemanly, such a cruel attack upon me. I never sought to injure one of them.

I have no thanks for John C. Bundy, Charles Ellis, Francis E. Abbot, nor any of those who co-operated with them. It is much to be doubted whether any one of them, taking all things into consideration, can present a better moral record than myself. The first, whose paper had but just ceased to drip the filth in which it had been immersed for years, and since conducted by a man who has shown himself black-hearted and malignant, led off in this vile attack. The last, whose paper has abounded in vituperation, slander, and falsehood for more than two years, followed suit. Some of their helpers who have howled the most about morality and purity are known to be very far from perfection, and if their true inwardness were fully shown up they would stand in far from an enviable position. Some who have made themselves somewhat busy in denouncing me have been guilty of conduct utterly immoral, as much worse than anything I have done as sodomy is worse than mere light and frivolous conversation. One, when his deeds were likely to become publicly known, and to meet with deserved censure, suddenly discovered that he had urgent business on the opposite side of the globe. A man will have to circumnavigate the earth several times to fully escape the effects of vile conduct. Self-righteous hypocrites very often try to wear the mask of extra purity, and the principal means by which they advertise their own superior virtue and morality is by being excessively shocked at somebody's else mistakes, and having a great deal to say about them. Many think it a very cheap way of being thought moral and of obtaining a reputation for great purity and imagine that what they acquire in that way is obtained much easier than by themselves treading in the straight and narrow path of self-denial. It may be so, and it may not; gains that come by dishonesty and by injuring others do not always "stay by," and produce the same amount of happiness as those won by honest toil and faithful, good works. As a rule, those who are very ready to condemn others, and whose very sensitive feelings are easily shocked at the sins of others, will bear watching themselves. Always distrust the man or woman who loudly proclaims his or her purity and cries down other peoples' vices. Such are generally hypocrites. The best and purest people are always charitable toward others. Pharisees and self-righteous prudes rarely exhibit charity. They judge other people's hearts by the blackness of their own, and if they find a brother has made a mistake they magnify it beyond all reason, they call other people's attention to it, and bawl themselves hoarse in proclaiming other people's imperfections to the world. Such are often controlled by envy, malice, and revenge, the worst qualities which enter into and help make up human character. This class of maligners not unfrequently seek to build up their own reputation and business by pulling somebody else down. There is reason for rejoicing, however, that they do not always succeed in their unrighteous efforts. "Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then thou shalt see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye," is pretty sound advice, and is often most applicable. There are a good many items in the private career of those who have attacked and accused me so unmercifully that might well enough be more widely known. I have not much taste for those things, but if this kind of warfare is to be continued upon me I shall try and change my tastes a little. A game that two can play at is far more interesting than any solitaire game. "The game of fifteen" will not long be popular because two cannot play it together.

I have no thanks for John C. Bundy. He has done me almost the greatest injury one man can do to another. Thinking he could take advantage of a mistake I had made, and while I was prostrate and under the heel of oppressors, he deemed me defenseless, and an easy prey to his schemes.

He came into possession, in a most dishonorable manner, of certain private letters I had written nearly two years before—and that they were ill-advised and indiscreet has been sufficiently acknowledged. Yes, they were private, and Bundy had no business with them, neither had the public any business with them. They had injured nobody, and there was not the slightest danger of their doing so. They were not written with the view of injuring any person. They had partially passed into forgetfulness and oblivion, where they should have remained. The only result that could arise in publishing them to the world was to deeply injure the writer. To effect this, distortion, exaggeration, and slander, with false and sensational captions and headlines, were added and interlarded throughout. His regular edition was not sufficient to injure me to the extent he wished. He aimed to strike me deeper, and to make the wound more deadly. Ten thousand extra copies and more were printed, and they were sent all over the land to publishers of papers by the thousand, and to everybody whose name could be obtained, and who it was thought could be prejudiced against me. An attack of the same volume and with the same malignity was scarcely ever made upon a man before, certainly not under the same circumstances. Envy, hatred, and malice were the incentives to the act, which no gentleman would be guilty of. The claim that it was done in the interest of virtue and purity is as false as hell itself. The entire spirit that prompted the deed was as ungenerous as anything that can well be conceived. I am told the man has still another instalment of the same lot, which he is burning to lay before the public. If he thinks he can thereby do good to the world, increase the magnitude of his bank account, that he can thereby greatly injure me and add largely to his own reputation, it is expected he will not be excessively modest or merciful. Perhaps he had better follow his bent. I have got so I can stand almost an unlimited amount of meanness. It would, however, be advisable for him to adhere somewhat to the truth. Publishing slanders is not always profitable.

I have no thanks for Francis E. Abbot. Let me take a very few minutes to consider this case. For two and a half years this man has been trying to do me all the injury in his power. After I was arrested the first time under the statute which finally sent me to prison, I joined with true friends in getting up a petition to Congress to repeal the unjust and unconstitutional law which, in 1873, was hurried through that body without debate or examination, and passed in the closing hours, with two hundred and sixty other bills, and when a large proportion of the members were drunk and scarcely knew what they were voting for. Seventy thousand people over the country joined in the effort and signed the petition. Mr. Abbot opposed the movement with all his ability, and attributed the worst possible motives to myself and others who had inaugurated the movement. He called us advocates of obscenity and vice in the worst forms. In the discussion that sprung out of the question he showed intense bitterness and unfairness. He uttered in the paper he conducts—during a few months—upon the subject and what grew out of it, from fifty to one hundred flagrant, positive, out-and-out falsehoods. If I cannot point them out, one by one, I will forfeit one thousand dollars. If I uttered one during that time I do not know it. I will forfeit another thousand dollars if he will point out a single falsehood I printed intentionally or knowingly. Between the efforts of Comstock and himself the movement for repeal was unsuccessful. I never spoke the first unkind or uncomplimentary word of Mr. Abbot until he commenced maligning me in the most offensive manner.

Among his first efforts was to make it appear that I had committed forgery, and this (to him) pleasing theme he took up more than once. I proved not only that I had not committed forgery, but, by the sworn affidavit of one of the best men in America, that he had. His slurs, innuendoes, and direct charges about "libertinism," "the immoral party of license," etc., etc., were almost uncessing. But his grand time came after his return from Mount Pico and after his friend Comstock had got me into prison. He then had me at great disadvantage. He could strike me and I could not strike back. By uniting with Bundy and publishing my private letters and decrying me as "a libertine," "a lecherous villain," etc., etc., he thought he could give me such fatal blows as I could never recover from; that my reputation could be entirely ruined, and the little business which, by dint of hard labor and close economy for several years, I had built up made utterly valueless. This was the object. Thousands of extras of the Index, brimful of falsehood and slander, were industriously, and with not a little expense, sent in every direction. He boasted of sending five or ten thousand extra copies. I think thousands of my friends can be found who were thus imposed upon by his slanderous sheet. He not only sent them to my worst foes, but especially to my best friends. His great wish was to alienate them from me and to change them to foes. How did he get their names? This question has been asked me in a great number of letters from all parts of the country: "How did Abbot get my name? I never have written him. I never saw his paper before, and my name has never been in print anywhere. How is it that he sent his vile sheet to such Liberals in the neighborhood as take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and not to others?" I'll tell you how he got them. He used the names of a stolen list of mine, which was feloniously abstracted from my office in the middle of the night, when I was abed and asleep, two years ago, and by a foe nearly as mean as Abbot himself. My office was entered by a key so nearly like my own that it unlocked my door perfectly easy. Abbot knew that list was stolen property. I advertised the theft widely and proved it. He knew it was a stolen list when it came into his possession. It is a truthful old adage, "The partaker is as bad as the thief." There is very little difference. A man who will avail himself of property he knows was stolen, to effect a deadly injury to the person from whom it was stolen, is as bad as the thief. What was the value of my mailing list of subscribers? Let Mr. Abbot settle it. When I started THE TRUTH SEEKER I had little or no acquaintance with the Liberals of the country or even with their names. I wished to place my little sheet in the hands of as many Liberals as possible, that they might know of the feeble effort I was making. I wrote to Mr. Abbot, asking upon what terms he would allow me the use of his list. He replied, saying the price was three thousand dollars. It was not convenient for me to spare that sum of money, so I did not make the investment; but I learned the price of a publisher's mail-list. Mr. Abbot, however, got the names on my list without paying three thousand dollars, and probably without paying three hundred cents, and I think my list quite as valuable as his. I would not exchange to-day, except upon payment of pretty heavy odds. So by the help of another thief he got that $3,000 from me for nothing. But that is not all. His intention was to do me a far greater injury; to blast my reputation; to cause my friends to become my foes; to ruin my business, and to leave me in my old age, when I emerged from prison, without a friend and without a dollar. That was the clear and evident intention of this man of "culture" and superfine morality. He is the man who for three years has been croaking and prating about the immorality of some Liberals and the great necessity of elevating the standard of Liberalism. Is the way to elevate Liberalism to practice the arts of the liar, the thief, the slanderer, and the robber? I hope not. I believe not. If it is true, as his friend Joseph Cook says, "men are measured by their heroes," may the gods take pity on the Free Religionists and the "cultured" Pharisees who take Mr. Abbot for their hero! Why, if he had written half the spooney letters that were ever penned, he would not be so base a man, so much a scoundrel in the eyes of honorable people, as he is to-day. If he had more spooneyism and less falsehood, malice, and the most despicable conduct, he would be a far better man than he is. As a bitter, persistent, unscrupulous enemy, I have found him excelled only by Anthony Comstock. They are boon companions in their efforts to deeply injure a humble, persecuted old man. I have not seen an Index since I left New York, but friends write me that Abbot has kept up his mean flings at me all along.

There are some others not specially worthy of thanks, but it is not necessary to name all. Some of them have given me and my readers not very pretty names. They have said we are a loose, disreputable set, while those whom they represent are decidedly a superior class. They have denominated us "tag-rag and bobtail." Not a very pretty name, to be sure, but perhaps as good as we deserve. After all, "what's in a name? A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." And so perhaps we as "bobtails" may reach just as high a heaven as though we belonged to the "cultured few," or "longtails." They are diametrically opposed to us, hence if we are "bobtails," it follows that they must be "longtails." Bobtailism of course means something very bad, something that should be severely frowned upon by all respectable, cultured, and pure-minded longtails. Probably of all the Liberals that are in existence at the present time the bobtails are the most to be pitied. By the bye, why did not Abbot select that name for his National Liberal Union, nee League of America and Mount Pico? Had they boldly taken the name of Longtails six months ago there might have been more Unions by this time. About the commencement of our era the Jews were divided into two principal sects, Pharisees and Saducees. The former were very cultured, very self-righteous, and very fond of finding fault and picking flaws with their neighbors. They made long prayers, wore long faces, and boasted much of their righteousness. Liberalism may be approaching a similar condition—the Longtails and the Bobtails. Of course the Longtails are the most pure, the most righteous, the creme de la creme and the very quintessence of culture and respectability. They are particularly pleased with choice Bible readings, like righteous Lot and his daughters, Jacob and his wives and handmaids, Shechem and Dinah, Judah and Tamar, Zimri and Cosbi, David and Bathsheba, Amnon and Tamar, Absalom and his father's concubines, Solomon and his seraglio of one thousand women, the Song of Solomon, which talks so beautifully about "Christ and the church," the fourth and twenty-third chapters of Ezekiel, with hundreds of other passages of a similar character. They can hardly say too much in praise of the Bible. They like those parts named especially for their "purity," and they wonder how anybody can see aught indecent or improper in all that. They also think it very wrong to say anything against our spiritual leaders, the dear clergy of the country; and they condemn those who dare say a word against them. What if they do hug and kiss the sisters! What if they do commit adultery, and prove themselves no better than sinners! They are a high order of men, and their little mistakes should not be alluded to. But let a brother Liberal, especially one of the Bobtails, commit the crime of writing letters to a woman and their holiest indignation is immediately aroused. They are ready to denounce the offender in the most emphatic terms, and advise the Liberals of the country to withdraw their sympathy and patronage at once; thus by pulling down an unfortunate sinner to allow envious, jealous, and malignant competitors, those who have an opposition shop, to rise upon his ruins. That is Longtailism, "culture," or self-righteousness.

Rumors possess great facilities for moving around from place to place. They even find their way within these prison walls, and they vary in character and portent. One rumor is that Bundy is coming out with another broadside of falsehood, slander, and vituperation. Another is that Comstock will again cause my arrest on some charge as soon as I leave the prison doors. Another still, that he will arrest me after my return home. And still another, that some dire charge is to be made against me by somebody, or somebody else, of some gross immorality, of which I am declared guilty. I do not know what it all means, nor am I borrowing the least trouble about it. I doubt not my bitter enemies will be glad to render me all the injury in their power. I am among both the most fortunate and the most unfortunate of men. I have the best friends of almost any man in the world and the meanest enemies. I shall hardly be surprised at anything the latter may attempt. I am repeatedly called "a Libertine," "a deceiver," "a very bad man," with lots of similar appellations. It may be true, but I don't think it is. I am a human being, with the characteristics and incentives of a human being; and I am glad it is so. I had rather be a human being than anything else I know of. I would, for the present, at any rate, rather be a decent kind of human being than to be a dried-up saint, or even a first-class shadowy angel. I know more about the status of things here than I do there, and I prefer to take the chances and remain here yet, if possible, lo these many years. I think there are some human beings better than I am, while there are quite a number no better. I have been called an admirer of women. I confess it boldly. I am an admirer of the opposite sex. I regard them as the better part of humanity, and am only sorry that all are not as good and as grand as some are. There is, indeed, a great deal of the kind, sympathetic, genial, devoted, earnest, sincere, self-sacrificing, well-disposed, moral, spiritual, affectionate, and lovely qualities in the human sisterhood, which I hope ever to appreciate. I sometimes feel like reiterating the well-remembered apothegm of Toodles: "Woman, you are a brick!" But even with all that I cannot think I am a libertine. I never ran away with another man's wife. I never seduced another man's daughter, nor tried to. My passions have never run away with me. I have never been an adulterer. There is no man, woman, or child can disprove this. I have striven to do injury to no person. I have lived in several different localities and am known by many people. I have borne a good reputation. I have never been regarded as a libertine and never called so until since I have been in prison. I think the charge as unjust as is my imprisonment. Wherever I have resided during my life I have found women attractive and lovely, of course, and some of them in every place of an obliging disposition, but I have not strayed after them nor held improper commerce with them. In New York city, where I now—when out of prison—reside, there are estimated to be no less than twenty thousand women who, to a greater or less degree, make merchandise of their personal charms, and among these there are many who are beautiful and attractive. These classes—for they are not all alike—are said to be easy of access and commercially inclined. They would at least seem to prevent any need of any one unduly importuning any one poor little specimen. But they have not allured me in the slightest degree. I have never called upon them or been into one of the houses where they dwell. My desires have not been in that direction, or for anything of the kind. Whatever my accusers may say, I have not been a whoremonger nor an adulterer; and as I am now getting on quite fast enough in my seventh decade—having lived so long without being either—I do not think the danger is great of my now becoming so. Were it possible I would be glad to give my enemies peace of mind on this subject, so that they need not feel troubled about the danger of my falling from virtue and self-denial. I would assure them there is no occasion for them to lay awake nights on my account, nor to worry themselves into a premature state of decline with fears for me. I have lived honorably and properly for sixty years, and fully believe I can do so during the ten or twenty years more I hope to add to my life.

So, my friends, if you hear startling and thrilling rumors of my great "sins," of my being "very wicked," in this direction or that, believe them very slowly; they will be very liable to be untrue. Wait for proofs before you cast me overboard. Let me place you somewhat on your guard. If you hear that I keep a stock of obscene books and pictures on hand that I make a business of exhibiting to clergymen and other pious men when they call on me, or that I carry such around with me, or have them at all, don't believe it. If you hear that I visit houses of prostitution, and hire the inmates to exhibit themselves in a state of nudity before myself and others, do not believe it. If you hear that I hire harlots to go with me to a photograph gallery to have their pictures taken when divested of every article of clothing, do not believe it. If you hear that I am laying traps and schemes to catch some poor unsuspecting persons, and enable me to get them into serious trouble, and throw them into prison, do not believe it.

If you hear that I am an advocate of falsehood, that I say I approve of lying, and show great pleasure because a man I do not like is thrown into prison, do not believe it. If you hear that I am advertising a combination of vaseline and salicylic acid for the prevention of conception, and that I keep the article for sale, do not believe it. If you hear that I wished to start an abortion shop, or wanted to establish any one else in that business, do not believe it. If you hear that I am fond of hunting up the private letters of those I feel envious towards, or jealous of, that I may publish them to the world with lies and gross slander added to them, do not believe it. If you hear that I have a stolen mail list in my possession, and that I use it for directing papers containing slander and lies, to the names of persons upon it, for the express purpose of deeply injuring the party from whom the list was stolen, do not believe it. If you hear that I have been dishonest with any one, and have tried to wrong them out of a dollar, do not believe it. If you hear that in a sly, underhanded sort of way I am trying to make others believe that some certain person has said or done something he ought not to, and that I have my suspicions that he is not quite so pure and cultured as he ought

The Godly Women of the Bible.—Continued.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE 19TH CENTURY.

ADDITIONS AND COMMENTS BY THE UNGODLY WOMAN.

Here we have, in close proximity, the career of an ungodly and a godly woman—Queen Vashti and Queen Esther. Vashti, being averse to subjecting herself to the lascivious gaze of inebriated courtiers, dares to thwart her husband's authority, and for this heinous offense is deposed, and her disobedience not only made a warning to all wives in the empire at the time, but through all future generations down to this very hour; while intriguing Esther is considered a pattern woman—a godly saint of the first water! The delicacy, discretion, firmness, and perseverance of Vashti are without a parallel, and worthy of all praise. She preferred the disgrace of a divorce, the retirement to private life, with all its deprivations and hardships, rather than the debaucheries of a licentious court, where she was compelled to submit to indignities at which her sensitive nature revolted, ungodly woman that she was! But Esther—she could endure all this ribaldry and far more, for we find her an artful schemer, a cruel, ferocious, bloodthirsty monster, a selfish, unwomanly participator and promoter of the damnable plots of her cunning old uncle and her weak, imbecile lord and master, King Ahasuerus, better known in history by the name of Darius Hystaspes. Not one trait of feminine character did she possess. So great was her selfishness that she would not arouse herself to serve her own people until her personal safety demanded it, for old Mordecai was obliged to taunt her with her elevation and indifference to the fate of the Jews, and alarm her with her own danger in these words before she would budge an inch for his sake or her nation's sake: "Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house more than all the Jews."

Nevertheless she did the job under this threat, her godliness consisting in self-preservation first, her uncle second, and her people third. By stratagem, as you have read, she succeeded in reversing the king's decree, causing him to hang Haman instead of Mordecai, and to put to death his own subjects instead of the rebellious Jews.

Yes, she was a godly woman. She was on the supposed side of the wrathful god of Israel, instigating the death of nearly 100,000 innocent victims, for "the Jews smote all their enemies with the stroke of the sword, and slaughter, and destruction, and did what they would unto those that hated them."

As shown through this entire series, whenever any one fought for God and his Israel they were godly and rewarded, while, if opposed to the Jews, and warriors in self-defense, and to prevent invasion, they were wicked and punished. Poor Jezebel and Athabah, therefore, for slaughtering one or more persons not according to the will of the Lord, were most infamously wicked, while other heroines, including our Esther, are very godly women. Murder is murder, and if wrong in itself we cannot see the difference, except in the "my" and "thy" theory.

But we must now call your attention to one fact that Mr. Griggs has failed to notice, possibly on account of its vulgarity and utter profanation of woman's chastity, as professedly held by the Christians of to-day. He passed it over in silence; not so us. It is our business to bring to view the hidden beauties of this remarkable book in the interest of woman; therefore we trust we shall be pardoned by our refined readers for unearthing this scandalous transaction. We do this for the benefit of such who not only admire and love the beautiful Jewess queen for her amiability and goodness, and who extol her as a pattern woman for all coming time, but also for the edification of those who hate and persecute as heretics all who do not indorse a book in which is recorded such damnable outrages as God's infallible word and only revelation.

The reader is earnestly requested, in this connection, to refer to chapter second in the book of Esther. He will there find that the kings, wise men, princes, lords, and chamberlains, who were so fearful that their wives would "not give to their husbands honor" and that they should be held in "too much contempt and wrath" if Vashti was not made an example of, advised the king to seek all the young virgins in his realm from which he might select one to be queen instead of Vashti. Now how was this to be done? What was the meritorious test on which this royal choice was to be made? We shall see. Was intellectual vigor and culture; beauties of heart and mind; feminine gentleness and sensibility; domestic and conjugal love, or even graces of person and exernal accomplishments, the requisite in this most important selection? No, not even eternal beauty would stand the trial. Sensualism—the lowest type of animalism—was the criterion of judgment by which King Ahasuerus selected his bride-queen. As revolting as it is to our higher nature, it must be said, in justice to the narrative, that this mighty test was the king lodging by turn one night with each maiden. If you do not believe it, read for yourselves in the book. Twelve months each were these virgins purified (shameful!), and then they were fit for the godly test. Please read chapter ii, verses 12, 13, 14, 15: "In the evening she went, and in the morning she returned." Then did she not spend the night with the king? Read again: "She came in unto the king no more unless the king delighted in her." Delighted in her!

As this trial was going on four years, minus one year for purification, the king during that time must have slept with three times 365 virgins (besides his numerous concubines), amounting to 1,095 maidens, ninety-five more than composed the wisest man's seraglio; and all these before Miss Esther's turn came, who, luckily, "obtained favor in his sight."

Oh, my, what a case for Comstock! Gracious goodness, what keeps the anti-promiscuists from squirming out of their skins! Heavens, earth, and hell, why don't the clergy-prohibiting Oneida Communists get up a remonstrance in an indignation meeting in Syracuse, or some other "cuse," and strike the Almighty dead for thus committing his sacred book to the practices of that deluded, odious, wicked people!

Keep still. Hold on, friends, we cannot help it; it is there. Who would think it? Right in their own book too! Not in "Cupid's Yokes;" and God wrote the Bible; Heywood the "Jokes." Mercy on us, what shall we do? Men imprisoned for selling the latter, and disfranchised to-day for not believing the former, and two centuries ago beheaded. How is that for consistency?

The record is silent as to the disposal of the 1,000 rejected virgins—virgins no longer. What became of them? Were they relegated to the seraglio to swell the concubinage list of the king who had "humbled them?" Were they apportioned out among Ahasuerus's servants, who had been so lavish of their advice? or distributed among the bodyguard? Perhaps they were returned to their fond mothers, to whom it would have been instant death to have attempted concealing them from the king's embassadors. Possibly they were put into foreign markets and sold into perpetual slavery.

When the Byzantine emperors chose a wife for themselves or their sons in a similar manner from the daughters of their subjects, they did not pass them through such a humiliating test, but simply inspected them from their thrones, as a general would review an army. It is left for Bible, and Bible alone, to cook up these delicious dishes of Comstock anti-obscenity. We will award it the premium, for it exceeds all others in that line.

Contrast, again, the godly, virtuous, pure-minded Esther—the last of the one thousand virgins whom the king tested ere he found the one in whom he "delighted in her"—with the ungodly, modest, sensitive Vashti, who shrunk from being presented by such a lustful glutton of a husband in a bacchanalian revel to his equally debauched courtiers. What must have been the character of Esther, to have accepted and submitted to such a husband? Who wonders that Vashti revolted—twenty-four centuries ago? She is the first strong-minded woman on record. All honor to her memory! And yet Christianity dishonors Vashti and exalts Esther.

O Bible, Bible, how hast thou disgraced woman and taught her, by such examples, to remain submissive under the tyranny of besotted, lascivious man; yea, even her own husband! Woman, why cling to such a book? Why name your little daughter Esther, for the vile Jewess, instead of Vashti, for the grand Persian queen? O woman, why will you defend Christianity and indorse the shameful outrages and unpardonable degradations forced upon your sex by the examples in that infamous book? Little children taught from its hellish pages in Sunday-schools throughout all Christendom to admire, revere, and pattern after these lewd men and women!

Then, again, how infamous, traitorous, and treasonable for Ahasuerus to put Haman and his own subjects to death at the request of this godly foreign interloper, to please and satisfy her cunning old uncle, Mordecai, instead of her, him, and their kindred, as declared in his royal edict. It shows how weak, impolitic, and unjust a man or monarch become when in the hands of one of these unscrupulous Delilahs. What a holy inducement is this success, and commendation for woman to deceive and lie that she may be thus promoted and canonized? If flirting to gain a husband is not encouraged and recommended directly in God's book, stratagem, deception, chicanery, lying, and murder are commended, applauded, and rewarded. Thus is woman taught in God's word the art of seductively sensualizing monarchs and other men, in order to raise herself to a throne and gain the passional admiration of man, instead of seeking modestly to win his superior, mental approbation through intellectual culture, refined aspirations, moral goodness, and true feminine love and devotion. The former won a king and a crown, without which possession one thousand beautiful marriageable maidens were left desolate rejected prostitutes.

The whole tenor of the Bible delegates woman man's subordinate, her first duty submission to his every dictation, her heaven-appointed mission to bear him numerous offspring, her highest ambition to force her passional attraction upon him "by hook or crook" that she may mother a "man-child," her lowest degradation, barrenness and consequent childlessness; in short, to be man's inferior in all respects and merge and lose her individuality in his; She is reckoned among the cattle, and "humbled" as woman by and among men, as best suits their every whim and fancy.

Preach not to us that the Bible places a high estimate on woman's honor; the facts are precisely the reverse. She is the sacrifice all the way through, and we will argue that question in debate, either orally or in print, with any and all the divines in the land, with no fears of a successful refutation.

Come on, gentlemen, let us see if your Bible, your Bible-God, and Bible-female characters will stand the test. We are more than ready for the contest. Let us see whether your book in a court of debate will be proved any less obscene than was that other in a "court of justice," so openly condemned!

Come on, women, wives, mothers, sisters, daughters, and even little children, and defend your chaste book and these so-called godly women, and see if we do not find that they all suffer in comparison, even as does the godly queen Esther with Vashti, the despised, deposed, and anathematized, who would not participate in a lewd, drunken carousal, but like a true wife and a good, rational temperance woman, dared disobey her intoxicated lord when he ordered her to unsex herself before his besotted, debauched companions.

Come, then, one and all, let us exercise the common sense in this matter that we do upon other subjects, and another century will behold this obscene, blasphemeus, cruel, revengeful, bloody, irrational, unscientific old book banished from the world and its destructive examples ignored, instead of such exhibitions as "the Cantata of Queen Esther" repeated shamelessly throughout the length and breadth of the land, shocking the refined sensibilities of thoughtful, cultivated people when they reflect on the moral of the play, as they behold "the holy men of God" personating the arrogant, crafty, treacherous, lying, bloodthirsty old Jew Mordecai rigged out in the paraphernalia of an Eastern court, while Madam Man-of-God considers herself highly honored, supremely blest, adorably beautiful, and angelically lovely in representing the infamous Queen Esther, a character too despicable for language to portray.

And this play from the Bible—God is its author; the church, the theater; the hero and star-actor, the minister of the gospel; the star-heroine not a frail figurante from a Bowery variety show, but the lovely, pure, godly consort of the respectable Rev. D.D.; the performance for God's benefit in the interests of his only true church, that by its sacred influence sinners may be converted from falsehood, lewdness, drunkenness, and all other immoralities, come to Jesus, be washed white in the blood of the Lamb, enter the kingdom through the efficacy of the moral effects of this exhibition of a Christian lie, viz., the immaculate Cantata of Queen Esther.

A. J. Oliver.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just learned that my friend an correspondent, A. J. Oliver, of Jasper, Hamilton county, Fla., has been appointed on the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League. I am certain he is the right man in the right place, and you will not regret placing him there. He has been one of the few who has worked quietly and earnestly for Liberalism when there were few to aid or encourage him, and now I trust he will be able to do a better work than ever and effect an organization of the Liberal forces throughout the state. We can each individually do a little toward educating people out of wrong into right, but we are powerless to move such great bodies as churches and states unless we band together on some common ground; and the Platform of the National Liberal League is the very thing. It is one that all can stand upon, and none save a blind bigot or a complete ignoramus could object to it. Will all our friends in the "sweet land of flowers," the "bright, emerald peninsula of the sunny South," fair Florida, report their names to Mr. Oliver and state the prospects of the Liberal cause in their respective localities and their plans for the progress of the great and good work? Be sure that you each inclose a few stamps also, as writing is an expensive luxury, although it is such a dear and precious privilege. Respectfully,

Snowville, Va., ELMINA D. SLENKER.

THE Californian for May keeps up its reputation. This, the newest magazine, is the best. To our mind, it is more readable than the Eastern monthlies, and is lower in price. For a leisure Sunday or an idle evening, the Californian is the prince of companions. Next month we are promised a poem by Joaquin Miller. Any one wanting a magazine which brings with it the breezy freshness of the Pacific, so refreshing after the heavy swells from the Atlantic, should send to A. Roman & Co. for a copy. $3.00 a year; 25 cents single copies.

Ella Clifton.—A Story.

BY AL. D. LEECH.

In one of the populous cities of the Mississippi Valley there lived, not many years ago, a wealthy and influential citizen named Calvin Clifton. He had amassed considerable money through the channel of speculation. Known to be strictly worthy, he was honored and respected by all who knew him.

His family consisted of himself, his loving wife, and three children—two daughters and one son.

The home was happiness itself. The youngest daughter, Ella, was blind from birth; but her father had made every effort to make his home happy and the life of his blind daughter pleasant. Music and painting were the father's delight, and the beautiful in art was cultivated by his family.

Mr. Clifton was an orthodox member in good standing in the Presbyterian branch of the church of the Lord Jesus Christ on earth. His home was open to every one of his faith; and many of the ministers who adorned the pulpits of the city were entertained by the hospitable churchman.

In an evil day there came a young reverend—Anthony Dixon, handsome, brilliant, talented, a great favorite of the gentler and confiding sex, and unmarried. His musical talent, his love for works of art, endeared him to Mr. Clifton's heart and made him one of the most welcome guests at the Clifton mansion.

Mr. Dixon was much in the company of Ella. He seemed to take an unusual amount of interest in her. He often spent hours in conversation with her—talking upon those holy truths he was paid to preach. In perfect confidence, trusting, and loving, poor Ella would turn her sightless eyes toward heaven and return thanks for such a dear and trusted friend. His easy and charming conversation made a great impression on her mind, and she drank in the truth of his belief and rapidly learned the lesson of love.

Months roll on. One morning the people of that particular church were startled by the information that the dearly beloved pastor had in the night-time folded together his extra clothes and quietly stolen away. When the information was brought to Ella she swooned away, and for a time resisted all efforts of restoration. When she was again able to control herself, she told her grief stricken mother of her condition; how, through many promises and holy reasoning, he had induced her to believe that it was not wrong to indulge in the sweet ecstasy of holy love. Under his teaching and influence she had been ruined and was soon to be a mother.

Mr. Clifton was greatly angered at his daughter. He had lived a life of rigid discipline. He could bear no fault, not even in his most dearly beloved daughter. Even when the love of parent should be stronger than ever, it was withheld.

He declared that she must leave his house, never to return; never to cross the threshold; never to look into his eyes, or call him father. The mother, in all the tender, mother-love, tried in vain to soften the father's heart, but he only said: "She has disgraced the family in the eyes of the church. She must go. I'll hear no opposition." She went to liv with her aunt at a distance.

Her aunt was not troubled with very much religion—as religion is known—she didn't know anything about salvation by blood or the redemption, but she believed in the religion of humanity, looked over the faults of others, and did all the good she could in the world; comforted the distressed, aided the needy, smoothed the pillows of the sick, spoke a word of cheer to the drooping, and was the friend of every one.

Mr. Calvin Clifton, true to the memory of the murderer after whom he was named, when he had driven his daughter from her home, erased her name from the record in the Jew-book, and forbade any members of the family communicating with her in any way or of receiving her letters.

Her babe was born—an infant son. She, though sorrowful, had something to liv for. For her child she would spend her life; to make him one of nature's true noblemen was her desire and aim. He should be her life, her light, her joy.

. . . . . .

Two years hav passed away. Her little Charles is now a prattling, dimpled child. his mother's constant joy. Her joy was almost complete. An occasional thought of her old home would cause a cloud to pass over the otherwise serene course of her life. Though blind yet she was intensely happy when her little child was with her. Such is the mother's love for her darlings.

The month of June is now at hand. Nature is in her lovliest state. The wild flowers are the sweetest, and the song of birds the gayest.

One morning to the aunt's came a gentleman, looking for some quiet place to spend the months of summer. He was worn out with over-work, and wanted the cool woods, the green trees, and the sweet influence of nature to make him strong again.

A room in the humble cottage was assigned him. He was a lover of the grand and beautiful, and ere he had long rambled through the moss-covered aisles of natures' grandest temples the color came back to his cheeks, and the strength Donald Templeton so longed for gradually came to him. The woods were a perfect paradise to him, and he would sooner walk beneath the shadow of the monarchs of the forest than stand in the shadow of the great white throne. To him the songs of happy birds were sweeter far than songs of angels. The wind sighing through the trees preached more eloquently than the most eminent divine. Between rambles he spent his time in the company of Ella, for whom he felt a great interest.

Donald's father was an eminent oculist; to him he applied, and after an examination an operation was decided upon, and Ella Clifton for the first time saw the glorious light of day. Her dear child now became dearer than ever before. Everything was changed. This beautiful world had been hidden from her, but now in all its beauty and grandeur it was laid before her.

Donald returned again in the autumn to claim Ella as his bride. He had prepared a house for her where he believed he might make her happy. The ceremony was very brief and performed by a justice, without any of the mummeries of ecclesiasticism. Neither of them chose to aid at all a religion they did not believe in.

Ella's first desire was to see her mother, sister, and brother. The distance was short from where Donald had settled, and one beautiful day they entered the city of Ella's girlhood days.

Mr. Clifton, by an unlucky investment, had lost all his property, and the trouble resulting from his losses eventually drove him to a sick bed, from whence he never moved. At his death, true to Presbyterianism, he would not forgive or kindly remember his unfortunate Ella.

The mother had long mourned her daughter as dead, and was overjoyed to meet her again; that she had been allowed to see the light of day, and the good husband in whose love she was secure, was to the mother a gleam of joy.

The chosen guide who had been the cause of Ella's trouble was afterward found dead, a revolver in his hand; had become tired of life and had ended it in his own style.

Could you now look in on Ella's home, after a period of six years, you would find her the happiest wife in existence. All who know her love her for her many fine qualities and womanly charms.

Donald is known far and wide as an uncompromising enemy of tyranny and bigotry, and hater of hypocrisy and the friend of the downtrodden and oppressed.

Possibly there is some good in religion, but surely where such individuals as many of the preachers are, are allowed to trespass the society of virtue in the loving, confiding, and trusting girl, there can be little love or real religion in it. Better do away with the Bible, which contains a sanction for so many crimes, and take instead the grand book of nature. Let reason rule, and superstition will fall into insignificance. Cease to support with your presence or money the superstition of the past, and the preacher's occupation is gone. Instead of bowing to an imaginary being somewhere in the skies, love your fellow-men. Humanity is grander than God and all his angels, and has more claims upon us than heaven. The ills of earth are more hell than ever existed in the bottomless pit, so try to make life pleasant to those around you and let the future take care of itself.

Jesus Christ.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I see in the Banner of Light, under the date of April 3d, a call, or rather an exhortation, by Bro. Newton for all his fellow-Spiritualists to come to Jesus or the Christ, and that whether we regard him as divine or human, or both divine and human, one day in the year should be observed in memory of Jesus and the poor. I am not one of those he speaks of as having caused him pain by the aversion, not to say animosity, at everything that bears the name of Jesus the Christ, but I sincerely wish for information. I hav little learning, hav never written communications for publication, and doubtless my grammar and composition will be full of faults; but I will try to make myself understood.

Who is this Jesus or the Christ? and why does he put the Christ in large type? Is the Jesus he speaks of he whose history we find written in the New Testament, and is the Christ one and the same person, or are the two combined, that which makes one-third of the Christian's Godhead? Does he mean him who was begotten by the shadow of a Holy Ghost, and whose advent into the world was announced by a band of angels, which appeared to the Jewish shepherds while watching their flocks at night, singing the song, "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will to men, for a savior is born," but whose birth, instead of bringing peace and good will, was the cause of the murder of all the children in Bethlehem and all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time that Herod had inquired of the wise men?

I think to hav rightly carried out the programme of peace and good will, as announced, the good angels, on their return to heaven, should hav taken Herod with them, or put him somewhere out of the way, where he could not hav so soon and so cruelly nullified their proclamation. If this is the person whose advent and teachings, including the poor, he wishes to celebrate once a year, I, as one of his fellow-Spiritualists, beg to decline. I supposed that Spiritualists generally had got beyond ghostly conceptions, as well as God and human hybrids, teachers of eternal damnation, doctrines of devils, and a bottomless pit.

How nice it would be to celebrate the miracle of turning water into wine, or of cursing the fig-tree, or of running the hogs over the bank into the sea, by transferring the devils from the man to the pigs! Does he believe these things? Has he a little daughter? If so, let him take her on his knee, open the New Testament, and read: "Ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" "I come not to send peace, but a sword, for I come to set a son against his father and the daughter against her mother, and a man's foes shall be they of his own household;" "If any man hate not his father and mother, his children, his brothers, and sisters, he cannot be my disciple;" "Whosoever believeth and is baptized shall be saved; whoever believeth not shall be damned;" "They shall be cast into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth;" "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels;" "And in hel[l] he lifted up his eyes, being in torment."

After having read the above quotations, let him say to his little child that the author of these, the gentle Nazarine, stretches out his hand saying, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Would she go? I rather think not.

If we do celebrate next Christmas, shall we take the children? But perhaps this is not the Jesus that he means; if so, let him define his man. Let him place his "heroic" clearly before us, for if we do celebrate we do not wish to go it blind. We once blindly celebrated the body and the blood in the Christian church every three months for ten long years, until at last we stumbled into the broad road, and I do not propose to celebrate any more until I know what I am about. Perhaps it is the Jesus that materialized himself, and stood behind J. M. Peebles during a lecture that he gave at Terre Haute, Ind., and who, by various signs, manifested his approbation of the discourse.

Good Lord! How pleasant it is to be indorsed by the heavenly aristocracy, and how respectable to hav such good company! I believe Bro. Peebles is an advocate of the pre-existence philosophy and transmigration of souls, and as there appears to be such an affinity between him and the gentle Nazarine, might it not be possible that he pre-existed more than eighteen hundred years ago? and possibly might hav lived in Jerusalem; and who knows but that he might hav been the beloved Apostle John, assisting at the last supper, and after going through the boiling oil sailed to Patmos, and there wrote the Apocalypse, which is about as grand and sensible as some of his writings of the present time?

Bro. Newton also says that we ought to gratefully recognize the benign power that givs us rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with gladness. Will he tell us, if he understands the workings of that benign power, how it is that it withheld the rain and fruitfulness from Ireland this last season, and left her to starve? Sometimes a portion of our country gets a shower of grasshoppers that destroy the fruitage as well as the gladness of the heart. Sometimes an earthquake destroys lots of fruit. Can he tell the rule or law by which the benign power works? He speaks of the noble ethical precepts and profound spiritual teachings which are put into the mouth of the Nazarine and his disciples. I sincerely wish that he had quoted some of them, so that I might hav known what particular ones he might hav meant. They hav been taught for thousands of years, and yet Chistendom is about as bad and undeveloped, in a religious point of view, and as low in their forms of worship, as the veriest heathen on earth. When the heathen mother stands upon the bank of her sacred river, and, under a sense of duty and the force of her religious teachings, drowns her child, she hopes to obtain favor and mercy from her god by the murder and sacrifice.

Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins. This is a Christian precept and practice. They plead the murder of Jesus to obtain favor and pardon from their God. Pray, what is the difference between the two? As to what he means by the revivification of Jesus, and of the resurrection in one's soul, and of others of the inner Christ, I confess I am wholly at a loss to understand, without he refers to an orthodox anxious-seat conversion—the totally-depraved man put out and the new man, Christ Jesus, put in by the blood.

With respect, hoping to hear from Bro. Newton again on this important subject, I remain Truly yours, I. ALLEN.

Liberal Labor in Iowa.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In common with others I hav been laboring hard to disseminate the principles of Liberalism in this part of the world, and hav, also in common with others, been pained much by the inactivity and lukewarm spirit manifested by the so-called Liberals in many places.

For nearly a year I hav kept the banner of Liberal thought unfurled in Clinton in the face of tremendous odds, and I propose to continue the meetings during the summer and make still greater efforts to spread the light among the people of this vicinity.

I will also answer calls to speak and to organize Leagues in different parts of the state if the friends will bestir themselves and write me what they can do toward the work in their respective towns.

There never was greater need than now of earnest, persistent, heroic effort in the cause of truth. Bigotry and superstition hav sharpened the sword anew, and renewed exertions should be put forth to recruit the army of liberty-lovers.

The Bennett reception meeting should be the means of arousing again the old Revolutionary ardor for "Common Sense" and the "Rights of Man." We propose to keep the thought aflame here on the 2d. Liberals who wish my services will please address me at Clinton, Iowa.

Yours for truth and liberty, MRS. H. S. LAKE.

Phelps vs. Pool.

A six-night discussion has been arranged to take place at Osage Mission, Kansas, between O. A. Phelps and Rev. C. W. Pool, of the Christian church, commencing May 20th. First Proposition—"Christianity is entirely of human origin." Phelps affirms three nights. Second Proposition—"Christianity is of divine origin." Pool affirms three nights.

THE Boston Investigator begins its fiftieth volume with a new typographical dress, which improves its appearance very much, although it was always neat. It is as interesting as ever, and we hope it will celebrate its centennial in due time.

to be, don't believe it. If you hear that I am using the arts of the hypocrite to make myself appear more pure, more holy, more righteous than I am, don't believe it. No, my friends, don't believe any of these things upon the mere "say so" of anybody, for they will all be false, and from the fountain-head of falsehood, malice, and corruption. Wait till you have proofs before you believe any such rumors.

But if, on the other hand, you should chance to hear that I am earnest in opposing myths, shams, and falsehoods, though made sacred in the name of religion, and though a th[illegible]d priesthood (to obtain their bread and butter, fine salarie[illegible]nd much honor) may insist they are true, you clothes, a[illegible]t. If you hear that I am willing to be in a may believe [illegible]n the unpopular side, in order to be where minority, to be o[illegible]n may believe it. If you hear that I I think truth is, yo[illegible]ds or devil[illegible] or for those who by have little respect for g[illegible]ghten peop[illegible]a into paying them talking about them try to h[illegible]r year, and also show great a certain amount of money ever[illegible] hear that I deference to them, you may believe it. If yo[illegible] get along teach there is a better way for men and wo[illegible]en [illegible]s and through life than to throw their reasoning powers asi[illegible]o pay some black-coated, white-cravatted gentleman to [illegible] th[illegible]eir thinking for them, you may believe it. If you hear that I would like to see the human race, especially the men [illegible]omen of this country, enjoying a greater amount of [illegible]freedom, having better and more correct information, and [illegible] informed, and far less in bondage to old fables, mental [illegible]erstitions, you may believe it. If you hear being bette[illegible] to maintain my principles, that I will myths, and sup[illegible]int what I believe to be the truth, that I am resolve[illegible] all her set may frown upon me, think and speak and p[illegible]. though Mrs. Grundy and [illegible]vict me, and though prison and though courts may [illegible] me, you may believe it. doors may again open to receiv[illegible] highest employment a If you hear that I regard it as the [illegible]ose errors though human being can be engaged in, to op[illegible]h they are ven- they are popular, to oppose falsehoods thoug[illegible]h they be erable, to combat hypocrites and liars thoug[illegible]e to be priests, and that I think it commendable to be willi[illegible] a martyr for truth, you may believe it. If you hear that I wish ill to no human being, that I have had a desire to do wrong to none; that I am resolved to spend the remainder of my life, as every man and woman ought to do, in performing good works and in doing all the good in my power to my fellow-beings, you may believe it. Yes, my friends, you may believe these rumors should they reach you, for they are true, and I shall try, to the extent of my ability, to keep them true. And I believe that in you I shall find valuable assistants, men and women who will co-operate with me, and that by our all pulling in one dire[illegible]nd steadily complish much good; that we can gradually [illegible] to point out the errors that men and women are clasping their bosoms, the enemies they are hugging close to their hearts, and that we can succeed in showing many of them the great and glorious truths they can far better embrace in their place.

I learn that my friends in New York are making arrangements to give me a hearty welcome upon my return, and I assure you I am looking forward to that occasion with lively anticipations of pleasure. I think very much of my friends, and it is a source of much joy that they hold me in good esteem. I shall be most happy to take them by the hand and look into their pleasant faces, to hear their voices, and to know I have their best wishes, their confidence, and love. I shall assuredly strive to be worthy of their continued approbation and to strengthen the bonds of friendship binding us together.

I shall be most glad to meet my affectionate, true, and devoted wife, and be with her again in our humble but happy home. I am fully convinced that my imprisonment, together with her loneliness, has been quite as severe upon her as upon myself. I hope my enemies will now be satisfied with the great discomfort they have brought upon both of us, and be willing that we peacefully pass the remainder of our days in each other's society and in trying to make each other happy.

I shall be glad to once more occupy THE TRUTH SEEKER office, to look personally after the little business I have struggled to build up, to receive letters from friends, and to be able to write to friends when I please; to receive friends when they call upon me, and that without the assistance of a keeper or overseer. I will be glad to be able to go about the city when I choose; to walk in the parks when I choose, to enjoy nature's lovely breezes and glorious sunshine when I please; to call upon friends when I have the desire to do so, to attend lectures when I wish; and to even go to the theatre should such a notion occasionally seize me. All this will be very agreeable, and decidedly a change from anything I have enjoyed for nearly a year. It is not improbable that I may be very shy of locks for some time to come. Perhaps I may have a fear of locks and bolts for the remainder of my life, lest by some unfortunate turn they might close upon me and again make me a prisoner. I will be very glad to keep out from under lock and key, and on the outside of bars and bolts the remaining years I have to live.

I have not done very much reading since I have been in prison. My writing has occupied me so closely that I have had but little time for reading, but I have lately read with very much interest my friend William McDonnell's beautiful story, "Family Creeds." I notice it differs, somewhat from his two previous stories "Exeter Hall" and "The Heathens of the Heath," in that it has less of anti-theological argument and statistics in mass, and what there are of them are so interwoven in the story as to be very pleasant in a way that keeps the interest of the reader fully awakened. The object of the book is to show the baneful influence of religious creeds and the consequent antagonisms and fierce hatred which grow out of them. One in reading it comes inevitably to the conclusion that too much religion does not make mankind happier, and that "love of man" is better than a "love of gods," and that to make our fellow-beings happy is far better than trying to improve the condition or to increase the happiness of the gods. The story is written with great care; as a literary production it deservedly takes very high rank. The object of it is most excellent, and well would it be could every candid inquiring mind give it a perusal. It is well calculated for those who are just beginning to give freedom to their thoughts on religious matters, to those who have some inclination to listen to truths though uttered to the injury of long-cherished errors. It is a fine book for young beginners in free and independent thought, and for doing missionary work. Those who wish to hand a book to a friend or acquaintance to give them something to think about on religious subjects cannot make a better selection. The interest of the story will induce thousands to read it who would not peruse a dry philosophical, argumentative [illegible]olemic or a long theological treatise. There are many [illegible]tic and beautiful descriptions and word paintings in the [illegible]. The visit of John to Rome, the renewal of his [illegible]story. [illegible]e with Jane—the loved companion of his child- [illegible]acquaintanc[illegible] her father are extremely well executed. A [illegible]hood days—and [illegible]rown over it. The part about Father peculiar charm in th[illegible]ws is very touching. The better Ambrose and his sorro[illegible] awakened through the entire feelings of our nature are [illegible] young or old, can read it story, and no person, whether [illegible]ular work with Liberal without benefit. It must be a pop[illegible] minds for many years to come[illegible]nterest Elder

I have also been perusing with not a little [illegible]ermons, Harvey L. Eads' book, consisting of twenty-eight [illegible]nd letters, and criticisms on the subject of Shaker theology [illegible] doctrines I have been interested in the book, not so much because I am specially fond of theological sermons and discussions, but because some forty years ago I saw Elder Eads when he was a young man, and myself still younger, and because the doctrines he enunciates are the doctrines I once believed. Shaker theology is of a peculiar variety, and quite unlike that of the orthodox churches. In several respects it is an improvement. Shakers do not accept the doctrine of the divinity of Jesus any further than all good persons are divine. They deny the doctrines of the Trinity and God being personal. They also deny the existence of a personal big devil, the eternal antagonist of God; but hold rather that evil is a perversion of good, that it is disorder, and a misapplication of that which in itself is good. Their distinguishing points of belief are that God is dual, containing equally the male and female elements; [illegible]he father element of Deity was represented by Jesus that [illegible]neared on earth, and the mother element when when he a[illegible]cond appearance in the person of Mother Christ made his a[illegible]r one hundred years ago. They Ann Lee, something o[illegible]Christ must lead a virgin life, hold that the true disciples of [illegible]n generation. They and live in the re-generation and not [illegible] and opposed regard sexual intercourse as impure, debasing, [illegible]r Ann to the pure spiritual element which Christ and Mo[illegible] lived in. Consequently they are celibates, believing that the only way to be true followers of Jesus and to win the acceptance of God. They regard nature as depraved, and think she must be opposed and subdued by every individual before he can be truly pure and happy. In fact, the great virtue of their lives consists in fighting nature, and in triumphing over it. Herein I think they are wrong. Nature is the highest power and the best power I know anything about, and it seems to me almost sacrilegious to denounce her, and say she is inherently wrong. If God is half female there is certainly nothing wrong in the female element, and if the other half of God is male, the male element ought also to be accepted as right and proper. We can see that in nature the male and female equally abounds. It seems wrong, then, to hate or to attempt to crush either the male or female element, or to asperse nature because it is male and female. Sexuality is eminently proper and essential in the organization of man, and is probably the grandest part of our being. It is what makes the sexes especially attractive to each other, and is the source of our highest happiness. Were it possible for our race to be all of one sex, how greatly inferior would existence be than with the two sexes. Now we live for each other, to please each other, and to make each other happy. The sexual functions are certainly not to be despised, not to be hated, not to be crucified. Without them neither sex could possess the charms they now do, neither could be perfect. I cannot think the highest life consists in opposing nature, or living in violation of her plainest dictates, but in being reasonable men and women, in seeking to benefit each other, and to make each other as happy as possible, avoiding all excesses and improprieties. Abuses are not conducive to happiness, and these should be ignored, including sexual intercourse, eating, drinking, etc. Temperance, order, and regularity are conducive to happiness, health, and a long life, and these should be studied. It is not a good argument to say, because animals of low orders exercise the sexual function, that therefore intellectual men should not. It might with equal propriety be claimed because animals eat, drink, breathe, and sleep, therefore men should not eat, drink, breathe, and sleep. If men and women live up to the highest inculcations of nature, avoiding all excesses and extravagances, they will be good enough beings for this world, far better, in my estimation, than monks and nuns, who do violence to nature's highest and purest instincts, and render themselves mere blanks and ciphers in existence.

Elder Eads handles his subjects quite skilfully, but as he [illegible] the Bible his proofs are very morphoses it fearfully. With him Adam and Eve were not the first man and woman on earth, but the first in some special dispensation or mode of life. The sun and moon which Joshua commanded to stand still were not the orbs of light usually supposed, but the two armies of Gentiles or Canaanites, one on Gibeah, the other in the valley of Ajalon, whom Joshua found he had no use for. All the hard and impossible stories in the Bible he regards as metaphorical, and gets over them in a way similar to the above. In the same way Baron Munchausen's tales, those about Gulliver, and those rich stories in the Arabian Nights might be regarded as metaphor and be explained in some ingenious manner. To me these seem like evasions and subterfuges. The Bible stories were evidently written to be understood as they are understood—not a book of riddles, puzzles, and metaphors, which requires a key to explain it, or a profound magician to interpret it, and this shrewd second thought, this patent mode of explanation, will not save its utter ridiculousness.

The Elder devotes one sermon in replying to Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses," and it does not strike me as one of his best efforts. He does not satisfactorily refute one of Ingersoll's positions, but endeavors to set them aside on the ground that Ingersoll is a "natural man," and therefore "receiveth not the things of the spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned." (The Elder's text is from 1 Cor. ii, 14.) In my opinion it requires a man to be very spiritual, nearly insane, or partially demented to understand some parts of the scriptures and make good sense of them. If we are to have scriptures which we must believe, it is a pity they could not be such that a natural man can understand without becoming spiritualized. Great fondness for the Bible is the principal fault I have to find with the Elder's book; it has altogether too much Bible in it to suit me, and attaches far too much importance to that unauthorized, unreliable, and untruthful Jewish and Christian collection. He attaches far too much consequence to such anonymous, [illegible]plete compositions. He ought not to so dishonor erratic, ob[illegible]n as to charge upon him the authorship, or the God he revere[illegible]h a literary production. But he supervision even, of such [illegible]very understandable way, gives his theories and beliefs in a [illegible] Shaker creed is and those who wish to know what the [illegible]th Union, should send one dollar to Elder H. L. Eads, So[illegible]v. Ky. (author), or to Elder G. A. Lomas, Shakers, N. [illegible]. (publisher), and order a copy of the Elder's book, which will be sent promptly by mail.

My friends, I thought I would perhaps have the space to tell you something about my third dream, but I have spun my letter out to such length that I cannot. Suffice it to say I dreamed again that Mercury came to see me, and that, as usual, he had a great deal to say of interviews he had had with Jahveh, Jesus, and Lucifer. I asked him if he had collected his little bill against Jahveh. He smiled and said he had, at last, but that he would not have got it had it not been for Lucifer. He (Mercury) had called for the third time upon Jahveh for the amount, and rather pressed his claim, but Jahveh repeated the old story about no value received, hard times, dull business, etc., but finally made what he considered a very magnanimous offer to settle the account if Mercury would discount it twenty-five per cent. [illegible]ury refused to do this, thinking it would be far more [illegible] twenty-five or fifty per cent. Jahveh was just to [illegible] matter when Lucifer luckily came in. haggling about [illegible] status of the case he turned to his As soon as he learned the [illegible] brother and spoke thus: [illegible] has gone far

"Now, Jah, this contemptible littleness [illegible] enough. You hired my friend Mercury here to do certain work for you, and promised to pay him and to do what is right. He performed his work faithfully, but because your speculation did not turn out to your mind you want to crawl out of your agreement, and make him throw off a part of his just claim. It is simply shameful. I told him I would pay it if you did not, and I will now if you do not at once do so; and if I do I will immediately foreclose one of those mortgages which I hold against you, now long overdue. So you can take your choice, only I ask you to make up your mind very quickly."

Jahveh was in a bad humor, and blurted out: "Why, I meant to pay it when I got ready, or at least to pay a part of it. Your putting your nose into my business in this way is one of your old tricks; you have always been doing it. But I will pay this account, of course, as you insist upon it."

And when he paid it, and got the receipted bill in his hands, he again said: "So much for that TRUTH SEEKER man and the work he has been writing in prison about us gods. I wanted to crush it and him, too, but failed. I wish now I had not undertaken it. I repent of what I did, as I have done many times before."

"Well, perhaps you will learn," replied Lucifer, "by the mistakes you make, to let men alone when they are about right, and when you do 'pitch in' be sure you have the right on your side. One who has acted the part of a god so long as you have should learn more discretion. But you are not alone in your impotent enmity toward that man. Others, too, have tried to 'crush' him, but not with marked success. You might all as well let him alone. But one thing, Jah, do remember, to keep your word and fulfil your agreements."

Dear friends, I can give you no more of the dream now. I have already detained you too long. If I ever tell you the rest of it, it must be at some other time. I want to thank you for wading through the long letters I have bored you with since I have been in prison. I should not have been so severe upon you had I been at home. But what I have written has served to relieve the monotony of prison life and to amuse me somewhat for the time being. [illegible] the part of an editor, but simply a letter writer (for which occupation, perhaps, I may be said to have shown a fondness and possibly a weakness). If I have been too familiar or playful, I trust you will not hold it against me. When I get home again I will write you oftener, but will not bore you with so much at once, not be so personal, nor talk so much about myself; perhaps, also, I shall try to assume a little more dignity. I hope I shall be able to do nearly the right thing.

Once more let me thank you and express the wish that we may all live happily, still many years, enjoying good health and the approval of good consciences, and that our unjust enemies may not be able to unduly triumph over us.

Very truly your friend, D. M. BENNETT.

The Reception.

We hope none of the friends will forget the Reception to be given Mr. Bennett on Sunday evening, May 2d, at Chickering Hall. Several friends from a distance are already in the city to attend, and we trust many more will come. All friends of free speech, irrespective of sect or party, are cordially invited to be present to protest against the injury done to the freedom of the press in the cruel imprisonment of Mr. Bennett. Hon. Elizur Wright, who will also address the meeting, will preside. Among the speakers are T. B. Wakeman, Rev. J. M. L. Babcock, General J. M. Roberts; editor Mind and Matter; Dr. R. C. Flower, Moses Hull, Lucy N. Colman, Amelia Colby, James McClellan, Prof. Toohey, E. H. Heywood, Henry Appleton. Mr. Bennett will speak. There will be music on the grand organ at half-past seven. A quartette will sing a song of welcome, composed by our esteemed friend, Jennie Butler Brown; original music by E. A. Booth, a popular young composer. The entertainment will continue from eight o'clock to eleven, or thereabouts. Admission will be free. Let everybody come and bring their families.

The Committee gratefully acknowledge the following additional donations to the Reception Fund:

"MAGIE'S MONTHLY" is the name of a new journalistic enterprise at Springfield, Ill. Its motto is, "For the free expression of Freethought." It is a wide-awake, live little sheet, and its editor and proprietor, J. K. Magie, is a driving man. It is anti-usury, and, judging from its tone when speaking of the outrage perpetrated on Mr. Bennett, anti-church. Price, 50 cents a year.

A Song of Welcome.

A lively song of welcome will be sung at the Reception on Sunday evening. The words are by Jennie Butler Brown, of New Haven, and the original music is the composition of Edwin A. Booth.

A Letter from Charles Bradlaugh, M. P.

In response to an invitation tendered to Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, editor of the National Reformer, to be present at the Bennett Reception, the Committee hav received the following:

LONDON, N. W., April 14, 1880.

THERON C. LELAND, ESQ., Dear Sir: I hav this morning received your favor of the 31st with inclosures, which I duly forward to Mr. Conway and Mrs. Besant.

As our Parliament, to which I hav just been elected, meets on the 29th of April, it is simply impossible that I can accept the invitation that you send me.

I trust that Mr. Bennett's imprisonment may be the last of its kind in America. The question is not one of approval or disapproval of the particular pamphlet for selling which Mr. Bennett was convicted. It is that all Freethinkers throughout the world are bound to enter their firmest protest against the endeavor to prevent freedom of discussion on social questions by the misapplication of statutes intended to prevent the circulation of objectionable literature, but which ought never to be allowed to apply to the publication of views which, however extreme or wrongful, ought not, by any stretch of malice, be included under the word "obscene."

If the Hon. Elizur Wright should be your president, as I trust he may, please say how cordially I agree with the stand he has taken in this matter.

Yours very sincerely,

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

THE city is full of "dodgers" advertising the Bennett Reception, and the pockets of the Liberals are full of tickets, which they shed in the stages and horse cars.

A Card to the Friends of the Liberal League Movement.

A few weeks since I requested through THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator the Liberals of the United States who were interested in the National Liberal League movement to contribute something to aid me in my work as Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League.

Out of the thousands of persons who should be interested in this movement fifteen hav responded; and as I am so situated that I cannot work for nothing, I am compelled to say that if there is not a more generous response to that request before the first day of June I shall resign and ask the Board of Directors of the National Liberal League to fill my place with some one who is able to work for nothing, or one who will do his work so well that the friends of the Liberal League movement will each be willing to contribute a small sum to aid him.

Allow me to sincerely thank the fifteen friends who hav generously responded to my request. All sums contributed will be acknowledged in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator the 1st of June.

H. L. GREEN,
Ch. Ex. Com. N. L. L.

Salamanca, N. Y., April 21, 1880.

[We are pained at this announcement by Bro. Green, and most deeply deplore the cause which has made such a step necessary. Still we cannot see just reason to censure him for taking it. He has labored long and faithfully, and has done work which, perhaps, no other man in his place could hav performed. Let the response be such as will justify him in revoking this decision.—ED. T. S.]

THE Reception Committee hav been hard at work, holding two meetings per week, in arranging for the Chickering Hall welcome to Mr. Bennett.

From J. S. Verity.

MR. RYAN, Dear Sir: I shall try and be with you on the 29th. I want to see our brave and noble martyr, D. M. Bennett. I regard his imprisonment as a great crime against the freedom of speech. If we are not allowed to speak and circulate our thoughts we are the veriest slaves on earth. I look upon Mr. Bennett's imprisonment by the tools of the orthodox church as an acknowledgement that they cannot refute his principles by reason and argument, and like all tyrants hav to use the prison and torture. But we must remember the lines of our poet, that

> Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again;
> The eternal years of God are hers,
> While error, wounded, writhes in pain,
> And dies amidst her worshipers.

I am the Treasurer of the Auxiliary Defense Association in Boston, and we have $27.20 I am going to send on Friday to your Treasurer, Mr. H. B. Brown, to help pay your expenses. Please tell Mr. Brown to say to me when he receives it.

J. S. VERITY.

Cambridgeport Mass., April 12, 1880.

To the Liberals of Ohio.

I should like to hav the name and address of one active and courageous Liberal, in sympathy with the aims and objects of the National Liberal League, and desirous of assisting the Sub-Committee for this state in the establishment and multiplication of local auxiliaries, from each of the following cities and towns:

Akron, Bellaire, Canton, Chillicothe, Columbus, Dayton, Hamilton, Mansfield, Newark, Piqua, Portsmouth, Sandusky, Springfield, Steubenville, Tiffin, Wooster, Xenia, Youngstown, Zanesville, Alliance, Ashland, Ashtabula, Athens, Barnesville, Bellefontaine, Bellevue, Borea, Bridgeport, Bryan, Bucyrus, Cadiz, Cambridge, Canal, Dover, Chardon, Circleville, Clyde, Columbiana, Coshocton, Crestline, Defiance, Delaware, Delphos, Eaton, East Liverpool, Elyria, Findlay, Fostoria, Fremont, Galion, Gallipolis, Greenville, Hillsboro, Ironton, Jackson, Jefferson, Kenton, Lancaster, Leetonia, Lima, London, Loudonville, Marietta, Marion, Martin's Ferry, Marysville, Massillon, Miamisburg, Middleport, Middletown, Millersburg, Monroeville, Mount Vernon, Napoleon, Nevada, New Lisbon, New London, Niles, Norwalk, Oberlin, Orrville, Painesville, Perrysburg, Pomeroy, Ripley, Shelby, Sidney, Troy, Uhricksville, Upper Sandusky, Urbana, Van Wert, Wapakoneta, Washington, Wellington, Wellsville, Wilmington, and others.

There is no reason why Ohio should not be as well represented in the number of her auxiliary Liberal Leagues as New York, Kansas, or Michigan. Come friends, send in your names, and let us be up and doing!

Fraternally yours, CHAS. J. HERBOLD,
Cincinnati, O. Ch. Ohio State Com. N. L. L.

From the Liberal League of Utah.

H. B. BROWN, ESQ., Dear Sir: Not being situated so that we could hav a representative at the Reception to be given D. M. Bennett, at the expiration of his most unjust and cruel term of imprisonment, and yet wishing to do our mite toward defraying the expenses of the Reception, and by so doing enter our protest in a tangible form against the usurpation of power, attempted through the person of D. M. Bennett against Freethought and equal rights, we inclose five dollars in the name of the Liberal League of Utah, the same being appropriated by them for the purpose. Before concluding we wish to say that we as a League wish to join with you in wishing our hero-friend, D. M. Bennett, and his affectionate partner in life, a long, happy, and prosperous life, and THE TRUTH SEEKER a booming success. Signed on behalf of the League of Utah,

WALTER WALKER, Sec. HECTOR W. HAIGHT, Pres.

Farmington, Utah, April 20, 1880.

How Christianity Rules and Ruins in Pennsylvania.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER Sir: Orthodoxy has scored another "splendid victory," and Freethought has suffered defeat. The followers of the "meek and lowly" hav once more triumphed, and the Infidel has been notified that he must understand that he has no rights which they are, in honor, bound to respect. The lawsuits growing out of the occupancy of the town hall for a lecture by B. F. Underwood hav just been concluded, and the jury hav calmly weighed the matter and solemnly agreed that the outrage committed was worth $125; and so they say we must pay $125 damages and all costs. In order that this case may be fully understood, I will giv your readers a brief statement of the facts as shown at the trial.

Some time in January, 1879, a committee was sent to the president of the school board to rent the town hall for two lectures by B. F. Underwood. They secured a contract for the hall for two nights from the president of the school board, who assured them that he had a full authority to make such contracts. The Sunday preceding the lectures the clergy of the town denounced them in the strongest language, and warned their respective congregations against attending such places, stigmatizing the man Underwood as an "emissary of Satan, and in league with hell," and called upon the citizens to put a stop to the lectures, if possible. This had the effect desired. The members of the school board knew that the hall had been secured in the regular manner from their president, but they were persuaded (by the clergy, no doubt) that as they had not individually given their consent they could easily repudiate and violate the action of their agent, and thus put a stop to those "most infamous" lectures. Acting upon this advice a meeting of the board was called, and met on Tuesday at noon, the day of the first lecture, and passed a resolution "that notwithstanding the action of the president of the board the hall be refused for the Underwood lectures." The president of the school board thereupon informed them that their action in the matter was null and void, and that he, having made the contract, would see that it was fulfilled. Accordingly he gave an order to the committee to take possession of the hall, which was done by some one entering the basement through an open window and forcing a double door open with his elbow, the entire damage not exceeding five cents.

Having quietly and peaceably secured possession of the hall, and finding the lecture would likely be given in spite of the effort of the Pharisees to prevent it, a few of the most active clergymen, with their deluded henchmen, made an effort to have the meeting broken up by a mob which had gathered about the building to see the fun. This effort, like their first, did not succeed. Notwithstanding everything was done that the devilish ingenuity of bigoted Christians could devise to interfere with and disturb the meeting, it passed off quietly, to the evident satisfaction of all who listened to the speaker. Feeling chagrined at their failure to stop the lecture, and maddened at the impertinence of any one daring to oppose them, these pious gentry gave the order that Mr. Underwood, Mr. Bowser, and myself should be arrested, fined, and imprisoned if possible, for presuming to burlesque their holy religion, and it was done instanter. Bail was furnished for our appearance at court, and the case has finally been disposed of, with above results. I have been credibly informed that the panel of jurymen were selected especially with reference to this case, and they were composed of as orthodox and bigoted a lot of men as I ever saw at any one time, proving that the work had been well planned.

Upon the trial we proved our contract, and also that the president of the school board had the right to make the contract, but this availed nothing, as it was evident to the most casual observer, when the judge commenced to charge the jury, that our case had been decided beforehand, and that the trial was a mere formality. The judge in his charge informed the jury that "Christianity was a part of the common law of Pennsylvania, and that if they believed the lectures of Underwood were for the purpose of holding up to ridicule the holy Bible and the Christian religion, they were clearly illegal and immoral in their tendency, and therefore the school directors were justifiable in refusing to be bound by the act of their president in granting the use of the hall for 'immoral purposes.'" This settled the matter, and the only question was that of damages. It was thought that as there was really no actual damage, the jury would find for the plaintiff twenty-five cents, but this was a mistake. The jury understood what was required, and did their work promptly, as if to impress us with the enormity of our guilt, and heavy damages were asked and given, for the "grave offense" of giving a Freethought lecture in opposition to the behest of the priests and Pharisees of the town. The damages ($125) and costs will amount to about $500. This case ought to be appealed to a higher court, as the verdict is a most unjust one and would certainly be reversed.

Wishing the martyr-hero (D. M. Bennett) a grand and glorious reception upon his release from the prison walls, and that his imprisonment for opinion's sake may be the last in the history of this country, I remain,

Yours truly, WM. CROOKSTON.

Irwin Station, Pa., April 24, 1880.

MANY of Mr. Bennett's friends will meet him at the prison door when the clang of the big lock announces the moment of his release, and many others will meet him at the Union Depot when the locomotive whirls in with the train bearing the martyr editor.

REMEMBER the second of May. Make it historic!

Convention of Spiritualists and Liberalists.

The fourteenth annual meeting of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists was held at Battle Creek, Mich , commencing on Wednesday afternoon, March 24th. The Convention was called to order by the President, Dr. A. B. Spinney, who made a few remarks, briefly stating the object of the Association, and that steps had recently been taken towards legally organizing the Association under a special act of the Legislature passed last spring. The Secretary read the financial report of the Society, also the articles of association, after which the President read the new Constitution and the bill under which it had been framed.

Considerable discussion followed. S B. McCracken spoke at some length regarding the proposed change He was in favor of the legal organization, but doubted the legality of the proceedings thus far. He pointed out what he considered defects in the new Constitution and articles of association, and thought it necessary to proceed with great care.

He was followed by Hon. S. C. Coffenbury, of Constantine. He favored the move, but advised care and strict adherence to the most extreme techuicalities of the law. Let us be sure we are right. Daniel Earle, of Plainwell, indorsed the sentiments of Hon. Coffenbury, and advised time and careful consideration of these incipient steps. He was followed by B. F. Stamm, of Detroit ; S. A Thomas, of Sturgis ; Charles A. Andrews, of Flushing, and others. The matter was finally referred to the Committee on Organization, which consisted of the following-named persons : Chairman. J. H. Burnham, Saginaw City; Hon. S. C. Coffenbury, Constantine ; Daniel Earle, Plainwell ; Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, Disco ; Mrs. A. B. Spinney, Detroit.

S. B. McCracken offered an amendment to article sixth of the Constitution, whereby the Convention instead of the Executive Board might limit the number of votes that persons living in any one place may be allowed to cast, thereby giving power to the Association instead of the Executive Board. The amendment was objected to by Messrs. Coffenbury, Stamm, Thomas, and others. Hon. Coffenbury moved to strike out that clause altogether. The President thought it an important clause. The motion to strike out was made but lost. S B. McCracken offered the following resolution, which was adopted :

Resolved, That the subject of legal organization be made the special order for to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Other matters came up before the meeting. S. B. McCracken introduced the Rational Appeal, a paper he has just started in Detroit ; the second number just published.

Augustus Day, of Detroit, was announced as having on sale a large assortment of books, Spiritual, Liberal, and scientific works, and would also act as agent for the Banner of Light, of Boston; and B. F. Stamm, of Detroit, represented Mind and Matter, of Philadelphia. The Secretary expressed her willingness to act as agent and receive subscriptions for any paper not represented until such times as their agents or representatives should appear.

Marvin Babcock, of St. Johns, was introduced, and in a pleasing manner called attention to his books, "Superstition; the Religion of Believe or Be Damned," retail price 25 cents, and "The Reason Why I am not a Christian," price 10 cents, and donated fifty copies of each to be sold for the benefit of the Association. On motion of Dr. J. V. Spencer a vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Babcock for his generous gift. S. D Moore, of Adrian, announced that he was there to act as agent and take subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York. By previous arrangement, Dr. A. B. Spinney was to address the Convention in the evening, but he proposed to omit the address and devote the evening to important business matters which were to come before the Convention, but on motion it was decided that Dr. Spinney occupy the evening, and the Convention adjourned till 7 o'clock.

Wednesday evening session.—Convention called to order by the President. Song by C H. Dunning, of Marcellus. Dr. Spinney prefaced his remarks by saying should he speak of individuals it was not that he had any personal or ill feelings against such persons, but when individuals occupy public positions they become public property. He went on to say that there was a desire on the part of at least two-thirds of the Association to dissolve the union between the Spiritualists and Liberalists of this state, but he very much doubted that the Association did desire such action. He had written to all the speakers and most prominent persons throughout the state, and all had replied not favoring the change. He then read a letter requesting the dissolution, and a correspondence between himself and the writer of said letter which proved the letter to hav come from a person who had never been a member of the Association, never given an hour's time or a dollar for the benefit of said Association. An open letter from Giles B. Stebbins was read favoring a division, also several from different parties expressing opinions regarding the union of Spiritualism and Liberalism, the majority strongly favoring the union. The union was brought about by a two-thirds vote, and now can we not as Spiritualists be liberal enough and open our hearts, make our platform broad and our rostrum free to admit all Liberalists, Freethinkers, and antichristians, and work together, not for the advancement of any pet theory of our own but for the common good, the good of humanity. Mention was made of the missionary work done in this state during the past year, and it was claimed that this Association was as much a Liberal as a Spiritualist organization ; and all Liberalists were invited to convene with us, as free discussion upon all points was desired, this Association advocating all principles advocated by the Liberal League. Mention was next made of the Mutual Benefit Association and how to make it a success. The Medium's Medical Association was next spoken of, an association which was a necessity for the protection of our mediums, clairvoyants, and magnetic healers. Let us stand up for our rights and stand by our mediums and magnetic healers, and let the two associations work together hand in hand. Let us hav a free rostrum, and one broad enough, where all can stand and speak their thoughts, where all earnest and honest souls can find a home, a place where Liberal hearts and souls can feel they can speak their thoughts and find sympathy and support. An earnest appeal to all interested in the progress of Spiritualism, Liberalism, and Freethought to become a combined power closed with an appeal for harmony during the proceedings of the Convention. After a song by C. H. Dunning the Convention adjourned until 9 o'clock Thursday morning.

Thursday morning session.—Convention called to order by the President. Conference for one hour, occupied by the mediums' short speeches. Mediums were present from all parts of the state. At ten o'clock, the hour for the special order, "The Subject of Legal Organization." The report of Committee on Organization was first in order. Hon. S. C. Coffenbury being chosen Chairman of said Committee, made a report embodying articles of association for a new organization, and recommended its consideration for acceptance. Mr. McCracken moved that the report be accepted. By a vote of the Convention the motion was carried. The articles of association were read and acted upon. The place of holding the regular annual business meeting was designated as Battle Creek, and the time for holding said meeting the Saturday on or immediately preceding the 21st of March. Remarks relative to the organization were made by Messrs. McCracken, Coffenbury, Spinney, and others, after which Hon. Coffenbury offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That this Association do approve the Constitution of that body corporate and politic known as the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists as a wise and sufficient organic law for this Association if adopted by it.

Mr. McCracken then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That when the persons designated to effect the legal organization of the Association shall hav effected the same, and shall hav taken such action as shall secure the rights of membership of all members of the Association in such legal organization, the officers of this Association are hereby instructed to transfer to such legal organization the records, archives, properties, and assets of this Association.

The resolution was adopted. The officers of this Association then signed and acknowledged the new articles of association of this organization before James N. Robinson, notary public, of Battle Creek. Mr. McCracken offered a resolution:

Resolved, That the further discussion of organic methods and of the various phases of Spiritualistic and Liberal organizations be made the special order for to-morrow morning at ten o'clock, and that the election of officers be made the special order for to-morrow at two o'clock.

Adopted.

The Committee on Mediums and Mediumship requested the mediums to meet them in the anteroom, and during that meeting the audience was entertained by some amusing remarks by M Babcock, of St. Johns, who never fails to interest and please his hearers. S. Bigelow, of Kalamazoo, formerly of Alliance, O., followed with some remarks on the good Spiritualism has done, and claimed it as the highest incentive to do right because it teaches us we must build our own heaven. Mrs. E. C. Woodruff, of South Haven, next spoke of the rapid strides made by Spiritualism and the good accomplished by it. J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw City, followed in his usual earnest and interesting manner with a strong appeal to all to liv and do right for the sake of the right, not for a promised reward offered in a life beyond. He thought we should hav a higher aspiration. A love of virtue, justice, and purity should be the incentive to do right, and not the hope of a heaven beyond or the fear of eternal damnation. He closed by saying he would prefer going to hell to being an inmate of heaven with a God who would say, "Love and serve me or I will damn you." His remarks were loudly applauded. S. A. Thomas, of Sturgis, asked permission to respond to the brother, which was granted. He made some very good remarks, but in no way pertaining too or controverting the ideas advanced by the speaker preceding him. W. M. Wooster, of Decatur, was the next speaker and spoke well; gave some good thoughts. G. H Geer followed him, stating that he was both a Spiritualist and Materialist. Mr. Babcock spoke next for three minutes at the request of the audience. Bishop A. Beals, the inspirational singer, having arrived, was introduced and sang a song, entitled "The Beautiful Hills." After which the meeting adjourned until two o'clock.

Thursday afternoon session.—Convention called to order by the President. Song by C. H. Dunning. Mrs. Mary C. Gale was the first speaker to address the Convention. She explained some of the objections to Spiritualism, said its laws were not fully understood, great care should be exercised by mediums that they attract a high order of influences around them, and not allow themselves to be controlled by undeveloped spirits. Her remarks were very interesting. After a song by Mr. Beals, M. H. Willson, of Indiana, was introduced. His discourse was very interesting. His subject, "The Relative Power of Protestantism and Romanism." "From what shall we reason but from what we know ?" Owing to indisposition he was unable to giv it entire, but the appreciation of the Convention was shown by the offering of the following resolution:

Resolved. That Mr. Willson be requested to furnish a copy of his address to any of the Spiritual or Liberal papers who might wish to publish it.

Adjourned until seven o'clock, P.M.

Thursday evening session.—Convention called to order by the President. Session opened with a song by Mr. and Mrs. Gordon, of Battle Creek—"The Beautiful Islands of Sometime." After which Mrs. L. A. Pearsall was introduced to address the audience. She dwelt largely upon the co-relation of Materialism and Spiritualism, and the necessity the freedom of humanity demands that Materialists and Spiritualists work harmoniously together; we should not work so much for future life as to forget the present Let us hav a religion that can be lived in every-day life; liv to do good and bless others. Humanity has much to accomplish. Her remarks are always of a highly practical order, and listened to with the deepest interest. Bishop A. Beals sang the song, "The Good Time Coming On." J. P. Whiting was the next speaker. His controlling guides gave many encouraging words for our future outlook, "If we dare the right to do." The exercises of the evening were closed by the reading of a Scotch poem by J. Madison Allyn, and a song by C. H. Dunning.

Friday morning session.—Convention called to order by M. J. Mathews, of Detroit. Conference for one hour; short speeches by A. Chapman, of Sparta; Geo. H. Geer, Battle Creek ; Mrs. Sarah Graves, Grand Rapids; M. Babcock, of St. Johns ; A. B. Sayles, Grand Rapids ; W. M. Wooster, Decatur, and Mrs. S. Slaigh; L. S. Burdick presiding. Mr. M. J. Mathews, Detroit, made a few remarks. He requested all Christians to raise their hands. No hands were raised. He then offered the following resolution :

WHEREAS, Disbelieving that any of the so-called Bibles are of divine origin, or contain the expressed or revealed will of any of the gods; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we will not giv any of the so-called Bibles places of prominence.

The resolution was adopted by a large majority, though a few dissenting voices were heard. After an intermission of fifteen minutes the meeting was again called to order by the President, and the veteran brother and Spiritualist, N. B. Starr, of Port Huron, greeted the friends, seeming more like a spirit than a denizen of earth. His mission among us was to introduce his pictures, ask the appreciative attention of the friends to his work, and present to the State Association a fine production of his mediumship, a picture entitled "Summer Land," for a small compensation, soliciting needed help. The matter was referred to the Committee on Mediums. The hour for the special order having arrived, Mr. McCracken submitted the following:

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Mar. 26, '880.

At a meeting of the corporators or persons associating themselves in the first instance as the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists, a corporation organized on the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year eighteen hundred and eighty, under the laws of the state of Michigan, there were present A. B. Spinney, Miss J. R Lane, Mrs. L. E. Bailey, L S. Burdick, and B. F. Stamm. It was, at said meeting,

Resolved, That the articles of association of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists—a voluntary association heretofore existing—be and are hereby adopted as by-laws for the government of this Association; and that Committees, Order of Business, etc., appointed and arranged for the present meeting of said Association be continued and carried out; and that the officers of said Association be continued as officers of this Association until their successors are elected at the present meeting; and that all members of said Association be deemed members of this Association.

The resolution was unanimously adopted, after which Mr. McCracken spoke at some length on the objects and aims of the State Association, explained his position in relation to the same, and insisted that we closely abide by the articles of association. The law of our land would hold us responsible thus to act, and unless we adhere strictly to all legal technicalities, the law will shut down on us. Though this is an Association of Liberals as well as Spiritualists, this Association is not political in its aims and should not become so, while the Liberal League movement is political in its aims, therefore the difference; and though one may not be a Spiritualist, we should not deny to them the right to act as Liberalists. Mr. McCracken was attentively listened to. The report of Committee on Mediums and Mediumship was then read, and some remarks made by Dr. Spinney led to a spirited discussion on genuine mediumship and the rights of mediums. Dr. S. A. Thomas said the resolution passed this morning on the Bible had driven people out of the Convention, and another such step would drive him out. Mr. E. C. Manchester indorsed Dr. Thomas's remarks, and hoped the resolution would be reconsidered. Mr. Matthews moved to reconsider, and a motion followed to lay it on the table, which prevailed. Convention then adjourned until 2 o'clock.

Friday afternoon session.—Convention called to order by the President. Song by Bishop Beals, "Watching and Waiting for Me." The audience was the largest assembled at any session of the Convention. The hour for the election of officers having arrived the President moved that the Committee on Membership, consisting of Hon. J. H. White, Port Huron; A. A. Whitney, Battle Creek ; Mrs. L. E. Warner, Paw Paw, act as tellers. The election resulted as follows:

Dr. A B. Spinney, Detroit, President, by a vote of ninety-six in a total of one hundred and eighteen. Miss J. R. Lane, Detroit, Secretary, by a vote of ninety-seven in a total of one hundred and thirteen. J. H. White, Port Huron, Director, by a vote of eighty-seven in a total of one hundred and one. The Directors holding over are B. F. Stamm, of Detroit, for the term of two years; L. S. Burdick, Kalamazoo, for one year. The President in a few words thanked the Association for its hearty co-operation and support, and after a song by Bishop Beals the Convention adjourned until seven o'clock.

Friday evening session.—The Convention was called to order by the President ; song by the Battle Creek Choir. Prof. E. H. Crane, of Colon, addressed the audience on "The Evidences of Man's Preadamite and Prehistoric Existence." He showed deep research into ancient history, proving clearly from geology the fallacy of the Bible statistics of the age of the world. He was listened to with intense interest. After a song by Bishop Beals, "The Rain upon the Roof," Mrs. H. Morse gave an interesting address, prefaced with a beautiful inspirational poem. Mrs. Morse made a strong appeal for the ballot for women. At the close of her address A. O. Askew, of Muskegon, introduced the subject of Uncle Starr's pictures, and proposed to raise by contribution a slight compensation for the very fine picture presented to the Association. Mr. Askew generously contributed five dollars, and was followed by Dr. Spinney and Dr. George H. Geer five dollars each. Others contributing, the sum of thirty-four dollars was raised. It was moved that a committee be appointed to wait upon Uncle Starr and convey the money to him that night, and a committee of three, consisting of A. O. Askew, George H. Geer, and Mrs. G. H. Winslow, was appointed. Convention adjourned to meet at the Opera House at 9 o'clock Saturday morning.

Saturday morning session.—Convention called to order by the President. The report of the Camp Ground Committee was first in order. Hon. J. H. White, Port Huron, Chairman of Committee, reported as follows : Committee had decided to make an effort to purchase eighty acres of land owned by Mr. J. L. Foster, at Goguac Lake, for $16,000, this amount to be raised by subscription of stock sufficient to pay for the land in cash by March, 1880. The Committee had further decided to make the capital stock of the camp ground enterprise $50,000, divided into shares of $25 each, ten per cent of the stock taken to be paid when subscribed for, and liable to further assessment at the option of the Committee when money is needed either for purchase of land or for improving the same. The Committee had also secured the services of J. M. Potter, of Lansing, to get subscriptions of stock. Mr. White made some few remarks relative to the proposed camp ground at Goguac Lake, and called upon G. M. Potter, agent for the Committee, who made a report of the work already done. He said they had not met with the liberality they had expected. There was subscribed $6,400 and some pledges that would swell the amount to about $8,000. Remarks were made by Dr. Spinney, A. A. Whitney, S. C. Coffenbury, S. B. McCracken, and others, all favoring the Goguac Lake property. A meeting was appointed on Monday in the camp ground interest entirely. The interests of the Liberal League were next represented by S. D. Moore, of Adrian. He spoke for thirty minutes, and closed by stating that he was present as a representative of THE TRUTH SEEKER, prepared to act as agent of the same.

After a song by Bishop A. Beals, Hon. S. C. Coffenbury gave a very fine address, taking for his subject "The Immortality of the Soul." After his address, "Uncle Starr" was waited upon by the Committee. He ascended the rostrum, his picture was brought forward, and the feeble old gentleman feelingly presented it to the Association. He said it would probably be the last time he would ever appear among us, but presented this picture to the friends, and hoped it would be preserved as an evidence of spirit-power and a memento from him when he had passed to the "beautiful beyond" represented in the picture. The Committee offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That we receive and duly appreciate the spirit painting, entitled "Summer Land," executed through the mediumship of, and presented by Prof. N. B. Starr, as a token of friendship, and that we tender him our sincere thanks.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

Declaration of Independence, Continued.

A CLERICAL CONVOCATION IN NORWICH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The devout disciples of Wesley are holding a grand religious "Believe Or-Be-Damned" Convention in this puritanical place, and the Rev. Rabbins, of the "white-choker" order, are gathered in solemn conclave by the hundreds.

These professional pietists are quartered among the sisterhood, for whose spiritual welfare they are proverbially solicitous, and where, in turn, their temporal needs are kindly cared for. But heretical members of the family circle, especially at the table, hav become surfeited with an excess of sycophantic sanctity and ministerial mummery.

While some of these self-seeking suppliants were calling down the Gods, fawning for celestial favors, and begging for a special seasoning of the viands with gustatory grace, a young man who had no faith in frivolous formalities, nor the fear of the Lord before his face, was busily munching the semi-blest food. But when their eyes were opened and the situation was comprehended, the withering look of pious indignation cast upon that young scapegrace was more expressive than words.

Hard-working families, struggling for a bare subsistence, are sometimes saddled with such salaried sycophants, and are thereby constrained to liv beyond their means. But our mercenary merchants state that in such cases the graceless grocer is obliged to stand in the gap.

An important object of this theological tribunal is surmised by shrewd sinners to be to concoct sacerdotal schemes for suppressing impious Infidels, and, through dogmatic devices, for more effectually feathering the pastoral nest by fleecing the faithful flock.

Four unfortunate Lovelaces were summoned to appear before this grand sanhedrim to answer for the gross indiscretion of getting caught in some of their priestly pranks, or the illicit impersonation of the Holy Ghost in overshadowing experiments. Two of these victims of venery, with due formality and a flourish of theological trumpets, hav been driven from the door of the tabernacle and sent forth into the world's wilderness of woe as sacerdotal scapegoats to bear the sins of the sanctum and serve to screen the brotherhood from suspicion.

Poor, forlorn fellows! There is but one of three plans for them to pursue. They must repent, be reinstated in their lost estate, and resume their former functions regardless of the late unpleasantness; or they may continue the pernicious habits which hav been fostered under false religious doctrines and still cling to the debasing dogmas which hav led them into ecclesiastical error by teaching that through faith and the observance of certain religious rites, the immutable laws of the universe may be set aside and the stern sequence of sin avoided. Trusting in the efficacy of an "eleventh-hour" repentance, they may decide to "enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season" and continue a course of crime outside of the clerical craft. Otherwise, profiting by past experience, possibly they may unite with the world's progressive people, press on to a true and noble manhood, and learn to prize virtue for its own intrinsic worth, instead of parading a gilded mask of piety for a superficial show.

They will then learn the stern fact that each and every one must work out his own salvation regardless of priestly promises and hocus pocus plans. They will then know that it is only through earnest, personal effort that gross conditions can be overcome and their baneful effects eradicated from the sacred tablet of the heart. They will then no longer rely on a blind, superstitious belief, an illusive phantasm, which has impelled religious zealots to commit against their fellow-men all the heinous crimes of which it is possible to conceive. Nor will they longer trust an ignis fatuus faith, which has been supposed by its inconsiderate devotees to safely lead through the miry morass of total depravity—regardless of "free filth"—directly to the pearly portals of paradise.

The third subject of sacerdotal scandal escaped the theological toils and went on his way rejoicing. The fourth coolly informed his illustrious inquisitors that they need not trouble themselves regarding his case. It was also intimated that he had been hopefully converted from ecclesiastical error to a more creditable calling; that he had quit the glorious privileges of priestcraft and had become a devoted disciple of Esculapius, consequently he could no longer fraternize with his old creedal comrades. Nevertheless, hereafter he proposed to earn an honest living in the M. D. profession as a reformed D.D.—a doctor of physic instead of divinity. This self-righteous conclave gave itself a questionable compliment by gratuitously adding to his letter of withdrawal, "on account of immorality."

A futile effort was made to "expiate" the tarnished reputation of the church by their favorite "blotting out" process of redemption, i. e., by expunging from the soiled pages of its theological "book of life" the tell-tale evidence of iniquity, that its sins might be remembered no more.

Perhaps this grand Synod may come to the rescue of its spunky little Jewish God Javeh and his colored colleague, the Hon. Mumbo Jumbo, of Africa, in their vain effort to suppress truth by crushing out free investigation. Possibly it may take up the "unfinished business" of the late celestial convention of the gods, as reported by secretary Mercury, and carry out the pious project which that august assemblage failed to accomplish.

The ecclesiastical experts of this pastoral precinct seem to hav a stronger propensity to persecute and more power to suppress "that man Bennett," the impious truth seeker, who has had the audacity to expose the phantasies of the gods, or rather the frauds of their self-constituted constituents, than all the divine demons of creation combined.

It will be remembered that it was the pretentious scribes and Pharisees of this place who vilified D. M. Bennett, that brave victim of sacerdotal spite, and so wickedly maligned our honorable petitioners who sought his rescue from theological toils. It was these professional pietists who, to their shame, concocted the nefarious "counter-petition" cabal, that conspiracy in the interest of the craft, for defeating justice and overawing Freethought; that priestly plot for reclosing the prison portals whose iron doors were ajar to let an innocent Infidel go free. Hence, in the great struggle for theological supremacy and the subversion of free religion, in view of their temporary success in rebinding with chains of clerical intolerance the liberty of a fearless, outspoken man, a dastardly act which has made their names odious to lovers of justice, and in commemoration of the godly zeal manifested in his persecution by local Torquemadas of bigotry, it is quite possible that this priest-ridden place may yet be consecrated as a modern ministerial Mecca for the pious pilgrimage of devout dominies.

BYRON BOARDMAN.

Norwich, Conn., April 13, 1880.

Liberal League Notes.

MR. WILLIAM E. SCOTT, of New York, has for the last ten days mailed me the New York daily Truth. I consider it the best daily paper published in this country, and every Liberal in the United States who can afford to should subscribe for it. I notice it is only four dollars a year.

BRO. V. J. BORRETTE, the representative on the Executive Committee for Nevada, a veteran Freethinker, writes that on account of his age he would like to hav some younger man appointed in his place. He thinks the Executive Committee man should be a resident of Carson City or Virginia City. Mr. Borrette writes, "We ought now to hav at least thirty or forty auxiliary Leagues in this state, and I hav no doubt that if the right man in the right place had been appointed at Cincinnati we might hav had them." Friends of Nevada, if you hav a man who can do more than Bro. Borrette, send me his name. But I doubt if a better man can be found.

FROM Dakota territory comes the following good news from Bro. J. W. McDonald, of Central City, of that territory. He writes: "I am unknown in the active Liberal ranks of the country, but for several years I hav humbly endeavored to exert a local influence in the cause of Liberalism. I hav read your encouraging communications in the good old Investigator, which I hav read regularly for many years. I purchase it of our newsdealer, who is a staunch Liberal and a gentleman. We hav the timber here to form a good sound Liberal League. A few of us hav talked the matter over, and as we desire to be connected with the National Liberal League I write to you for instructions as to how to organize."

PROF. A. J. OLIVER, recently appointed to represent the state of Florida on the Executive Committee, has made choice of the following named persons to act with him as the Executive Sub Committee of the National Liberal League for Florida: Hon. T. N. Bell, Hon. H. J. J. Duncan, Col. D. B. Johnson, and William Bach, Esq. Bro. Oliver did not giv the post-office address of the members of his Committee, and I wish he would do so. Florida is one of the few states where, as yet, no auxiliary Liberal League has been formed. I hope before the meeting of the next Liberal League Congress a number of Leagues may be formed in this state, for it would look very encouraging to see every state in the Union represented in the next Congress. I am sure that Prof. Oliver will do his whole duty in Florida.

BRO. S. C. ROGERS, our representative for Arizona, has just sent me a most interesting report from that territory. He giv a thrilling account of his experience with the wild Indians since 1867, when he removed to where he now resides. I wish your space would permit the publication of the whole letter. Truly, Bro. Rogers is a brave man and is a worthy representative of Freethought. In the wilds of Arizona he has at last succeeded in building up a pleasant home on a farm of some four hundred acres of the best land in the world, and he now proposes to devote the remainder of his days to the promulgation of Liberal views. He writes: "Orthodoxy is at a very low ebb in this territory. Ministers of all the various denominations are striving hard in the principal towns to raise a religious breeze, but with poor success and little encouragement. My estimate is that four-fifths of the American population are Liberals, but as yet they are totally unorganized." And Bro. Rogers reports that the recent droughts hav left the people so poor that for the present they hav all they can do to liv. But the prospects for this season are good, and we may then, he thinks, expect after harvest to hear of Leagues forming in all parts of the territory.

PROF. O. A. PHELPS, whom some of our Western friends characterize as "the young Ingersoll of the West," writes, under date of the 21st inst.: "I lecture at Concordia, Kan., this and to-morrow evening, at Seapo the 23d and 24th, at Scandia the 25th and 26th, at Netawaka the 27th, 28th, and 29th, at Valley Falls May 1st to 4th. From thence I go to south Kansas, commencing at Medicine Lodge May 8th. On May 20th I commence a six-evenings' debate with Rev. C. W. Pool, of the Campbellite or Christian church, at Osage Mission, in the southern part of Kansas. The first proposition to be debated, 'Christianity is Entirely of Human Origin,' I affirm. The second proposition, 'Christianity is of Divine Origin,' Pool affirms. Each proposition is to be discussed three evenings." And allow me to call the attention of Bro. M. H. Coffin and others of the far West and Pacific coast to the following extract from Bro. Phelps' letter: "I wish you would say to Mr. M. H. Coffin, of Longmont, Colorado, who wants to secure a lecturer for that territory, that I think I can fill the bill [and I think so, too.—H. L. G]. I would like to go to Colorado, for my health is poor, and I think a couple of months in that territory would cure me. Don't tell Bro. Coffin of my ill health, however." There, I hav let the cat out of the bag, and told of Prof. Phelps' ill health. But never mind; he is well enough to vanquish any orthodox dominie west of the Rocky Mountains or east of them.

MARIA L. FOLLETT, the Secretary of Barber's Creek Liberal League, of Rapids City, Ill., sends the following interesting report: "Our League is composed of members from both sides of the Mississippi river, from La Claire, Iowa, and Rapids City, Ill., and we therefore claim to be the 'connecting link' uniting the great chain of auxiliary Leagues of the East and West. We hav a small circulating library with which we are doing a good work in this vicinity. In our reading-room we hav THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Investigator, the Western Liberal, and other Liberal papers; Ingersoll's lectures and other choice pamphlets, and I hereby solicit contributions to our library and reading-room. Those who wish to send Liberal literature can address 'La Claire Liberal Library, Le Claire, Iowa.' Our local paper, the Pilot, has come out boldly in favor of radical Liberalism. The Liberal element in the vicinity is vigorous and rapidly gaining ground. We rejoice in the leadership of our brave E. C. Walker, and we are endeavoring to hold up his hands in the contest for liberty. When yourself, D. M. Bennett, T. C. Leland, E. H. Heywood, and other champions of liberty and truth, are numbered in the members in the Liberal army, depend upon a ringing response from Barber's Creek Liberal League." H. L. GREEN.

George Francis Train on Comstock.

Mr. Train's epigrams in the New York Star are being published in five-cent volumes by S. Franklin Wilson, 27 Chatham street, under the name of the "Epigram Library." He goes for Comstock without gloves, calling on Congress to stamp out the wretched spy! This is the epigram on Mr. Bennett's incarceration:

[Star Epigram No. 28]

MADISON SQUARE EPIGRAMS.

CONGRESS IMPEACHED!

MADISON SQUARE, P. E., 51.

CITIZEN RANDALL, SPEAKER OF CITIZENS REPRESENTATIVES, MEMBERS OF CONGRESS, SENATORS, AND OFFICERS OF BOTH HOUSES:

Citizens are so badly mixed they act like idiots when they go to Washington. They crawl, they do not walk upright! They seem to consider it a favor for you to notice them at all! They petition! Big thing to ask coachman permission to ride in one's own carriage! Cook, to eat one's own dinner! Chambermaid, to sleep in one's own bed! Are you our master or servant? Did we elect you or you elect us? Do you liv on our stamps or are we living on yours? These conundrums arise from your insults to Weaver! For two months you turned your back on him every Monday! That destroyed free speech, and the hour has come for you to back down or be Cromwellized, for Bennett comes out first of May!

Down with Congress!

Congress's a spy! a dog! an ass!
To let this Comstock "Bog-shop" pass!
Freedom's thought comes through voice and pen,
Not from your Comstock "Obscene den!"
"Great statesmen" break open our mails!
Smoke! drink! gamble! gorge on quails!
Listen at keyholes! Crosbyize
Citizens with your Comstock lies!
Shylock the land with Syndicates,
In union of dis-United States!
If you can spy our letters, what next
Outrageous act will be your text?
Boa-ed to death in anaconda pay,
You grab the stamps and steal away!
Can't you change your base demeanor?
Why not be your own Redeemer?
New thoughts! new laws! new light! new days!
Suggest that Congress mend her ways!
I hereby giv you notice fair,
Repeal Comstock laws, and do it square!
No nonsense, men! or Banquo's ghost
Will hang some day on first lamp-post!
Now TRUTH SEEKER Bennett comes out of cell,
Look out, or he will giv you "L!"
When Demons pass a Comstock law,
Psychos declare relentless war!
This lying whelp, it comes to pass,
Has made Congress a first-class Ass!
When free nation outrages mails,
Liberty dies where freedom fails!
What other land dare forge fetters
That violate one's private letters?
Sir James Graham once lost his head
For that! Are all our M. C.'s dead?
Repeal the bill, or we'll repeal you,
And all your vile and rotten crew!

Comstock's Stock of Filth.

Comstock carries his filthy load
To Washington, the bloated toad!
And you, gloating in "Obscene show,"
Strike down the mails with one foul blow!
When Hewitt's committee found the fox,
Comstock was saved by Sunset Cox!
Big thing, investigating acts
You made yourselves to cover tracks!
Corrupt laws that weigh down your shelves,
Laws which some day will hang yourselves!
What right hav you to deal in stocks,
Ticking through Gould's electric shocks?
TRUTH SEEKER Bennett still in jail
For selling book sold on all ways,
Whose author, Heywood, sends through mail
"Cupid's Yokes," since pardoned by Hayes.
Shepherd Cowley in felon's cell
For saving waifs from Zion's "L!"
At home, while Congress sends abroad
Bread that Demagogues applaud!
Kearney bastiled for threats to kill
After Congress passed Chinese bill!
While "Vig-i-Lants" force civil war

And nation's troops o'erride state law,
Labor Standard McDonnell caged
For defending workmen enraged!
For printing complsints against the rich,
Starving labor in Jersey's ditch!
Crosby forcing his blackmail lies,
Flooding city with law-made spies!
Watching household as Comstock mail
To force our citizens in jail!
With strikers striking far and wide,
How long before this outraged tide
Congress will strike? to Cromwellize
A Congress run on Gold-coin lies!
Facing such facts is Congress mad?
Are you insane or only bad?

Peter Cooper's Mistake.

Cooper Institute shines for all,
Yet Peter Cooper refused the hall
To Bennett Liberal Committee—
A disgrace to New York city!
Pretending that he would not do it,
Did it through the bigot Hewitt!
Peter Cooper! Liberal chief!
Infidel! skeptic! comes to grief
At ninety! And yet he pretends
Free speech! free press! Freethought! free friends!
Worse still, the silence of the press
At colleague bastiled in distress!
Not so bad this man and brother
As your act free mails to smother!
Your dirty act on Comstock mail,
Keeping Bennett a year in jail!
'Tis thus you gained your Christian will
Through "Obscene Bill" free men to kill!
When Benedict and jury lied,
TRUTH SEEKER to destroy you tried!
Your "Rump Parliament" and your vile crew
Bennett will Cromwell Waterloo!
Bennett cheers in Chickering Hall,
Foreshadow death on banquet wall!
Hayes broke his neck in his disgrace!
How can the President efface
The fact, Two Hundred Thousand Names,
Live men and women, too, of brains,
Spoke out their thoughts and bravely spoke
Their minds against this Cupid's joke!
But White House, black with Bigot rule,
Is Comstock's bigot "Obscene" school,
Where Colgate now such Christians praise
Through "Obscene" pictures with Mrs. Hayes!
If not why could not pardon cries
Expose at once the Comstock lies?
Did Roger Chapman when "Obscene"
Use Colgate's "patent Vaseline?"
Two hundred members tried to save
Chapman from his "Obscene" grave!
Congress' "Procurer!" White House Saint!
And yet TRUTH SEEKER makes you faint!
You tried to kill this poor old man,
But he wouldn't die worth a dam!
Look out, boys! he may show you
What an outraged Pagan can do!
His will you neither broke nor bent,
But he will break the President!

African Fetich and Fanatic
Passed down rubbish from bigot attic,
Absorbing all the Pagan Dregs
To stand our Zion on its legs!
Now Earth's hungry corporate greed
Is poisoned by this ancient seed!
Thus, day by day, Crime's fatal force
Through Zion's Tramps runs its course!
Food and plenty inside Church,
With Starving Labor left in lurch!
"What! not giv poor child your lunch?
No! but, Jesus said, the will, with hunch!"
The hour has come that Comstockism
Be locked up in Comstock prison!
His outrage on our private mail
Should land all Congress fast in jail—
Congress, who gave this wretch power
To Bastile Man in Felon's Tower!
He went himself, or sent his Guide,
For Ashton's "Nature's Marriage Guide!"
But Grant, through Thurlow Weed,
Saved these men from Comstock's greed!
Prosch, maker of Stereopticon,
Was jugged on Herculaneum!
When Comstock tried to seize
This aged man, friends forced release!
Wengenrath was sent to prison
For Sugaring Creation in a Prism!
But a Lady Doctor slapped his face
When he arrested Sara Chase!
Sending Doctor's Syringe through mail
He put a poor old man in Jail,
Leaving his Starving family to die—
His wife to prostitution lie!
But worse than all, sold Doctor Foote,
From whom he got Four Thousand "loot!"
These fearful facts, long forgotten,
Prove our entire nation rotten!
And yet you try to Hold The Fort
Through Swindling Laws and Fraud's High Court!
Your last resort of Scheming Knaves
Is to enslave again the Slaves!
This time 'tis White and Black alike
Syndicate robbers strive to strike!
See how these rascals in their place
Indorse their Crime on Human Race!

Senatorial Morals!

As Burnside's Educational Bill—elements of social and moral science—embrace industry! order! economy! punctuality! patience! self-denial! death! purity! temperance! cleanliness! honesty! truth! justice! politeness! peace! fidelity! philanthropy! patriotism! self-respect! hope! perseverance! courage! cheerfulness! self-reliance! gratitude! pity! mercy! kindness! conscience! reflection! will! Bohemia suggests the personal application to Senate and House, which lacks all these elements!

Vide Purity and Self-Denial! Senator Ben Hill, Georgia! Congressman Acklen, Lousian a! Perseverance! Congressman Weaver, Iowa, in frantic endeavors to "catch Speaker's eye!" Patriotism! Confederate Brigadiers who love country to greater or lesser extent, as the spoils suggest! Temperance! Members who over-crook elbow! Cleanliness! Congressmen who rarely change linen once a week! Industry! those who excel in dolce far niente! Economy! those whose pay accounts are discounted by note-shavers months ahead.

False words! False clothes! In Truth's disguise
He trips mankind with Bible-lies!
He vampires and destroys the weak,
But to the rich he acts the sneak!
Desire for fame whets appetite
To dark-lantern Truth's solar light!
He ruined Leander Fox and Son
Through Decoy trick the Blackguard done!
One wonders at each outrage read
That bullet does not pierce his head!
Or that the Miscreant saved his life
When escaping from Conroy's knife!
This Vampire against human kind,
This mad-dog, biter of mankind,
Indulges in prayer's wild joy,
When Victim dies through vile decoy!
You load the dice, The cards you pack,
To force once more your Nero back—
To guard the stamps for you to steal,
While Nation shakes and Strikers reel!
You choose two robbers from your den
To lead Toil's Band of Honest men,
And through this Weaver outrage teach
How Czars and Sultans kill free speech!
Pass your Vile Laws! On with the Dance!
But don't forget that "Hell in France!"
Frenchmen like you planted error
To Harvest Blood's Reign of Terror!

A National Insult!

Of course you saw old Nast's cartoon
In Harper's, of that mammoth uss!
You were the asses, not Weaver,
Congress's in hands of Receiver!
This nasty Nast is Shylock's imp,
The Syndicate's bulldozing pimp!
Don't fool with Gould's Pacific Mail,
The real negro's Pacific Rail!
Jay Gould, Huntington, and Tom Scott,
Through Stock Exchange make Lobby hot!
The old game of dinners and wines
No longer suits the stirring times!
The Lobby now is all inside,
To catch the speculative tide!
Members now are bought and sold,
As cattle are with broker's gold!
Compare your milk and water, chalk
With star cream sent you from New York!
More points I've made in briefer space,
Than your whole session can displace!
Unclaimed! unclubbed! unclassified!
Alone I swim against the tide
Through Star's boiled down figures and facts!
Facts shown up in Glover's report,
Which you suppress in open court!
Suppress what the thieves dare not show
Who stole the stamps and struck the blow!

GEO. FRANCIS TRAIN.

A prison is a house of care,
A place where none can thrive,
A touchstone true to try a friend,
A grave for one alive!

Sometimes a place of right,
Sometimes a place of wrong,
Sometimes a place of rogues and thieves,
And honest men among!
(On Edinburgh Tolbuth.)

Bennett should speak in felon Types
To show up fraud in Convict's Stripes!
Let him appear in Chickering Hall
In stripes, and show the coming fall
Of Zion! Then TRUTH SEEKER page
And Bennett will be all the rage!
Why not expose the Comstock Scamps
While bagging all their Zion's stamps?

Letters from Friends.

WHITEWATER, WIS, April 19, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As you are about to get your liberty and act for yourself, I want to let them know here that THE TRUTH SEEKER is still alive. I send you two subscribers for six months each. I inclose five dollars—three to pay for papers, and two to finish paying for the two volumes of Mr. Bennett's new work in cloth. I am in hopes they will giv Mr. Bennett a fine reception so he will take courage.

Yours truly, J. P. WHIPPLE.

ORANGE CITY, FLORIDA, April 9, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I inclose an order for books according to the terms offered in your private letter of March 31, which came duly to hand. I feel that we can not better show our appreciation of your generous terms than by giving you a short history of the formation of our library and its present condition.

About a year ago the residents of our young and thriving city concluded to form ourselves into a library association, with the understanding among ourselves, and so expressed in the constitution and by-laws, that it was to be cosmopolitan in its character and unsectarian in the selection and admission of reading matter.

The Liberal element is pretty strong here, and at first we had no trouble. We had taken in about seventy-five volumes of miscellaneous matter, when we thought we would test their Liberality. We first presented "The Clergy a Source of Danger." That was accepted by the executive committee, with some twenty-five or thirty other volumes, on the same evening, and passed without comment. A short time after that we presented the "Age of Reason." That, too, passed without comment at the time, except a remark from a good Methodist lady present, who wondered if that was written before or after his conversion. My husband, thinking the remark must be made in jest, replied that he presumed it was after. It was not long ere we began to hear the muttering of a gathering storm, and a special meeting was called for the purpose of examining the merits and demerits of some very obnoxious books which had been handed into the library. My husband was chairman of the executive board. I was also a member, and although a majority could see no reason why the books should not be in the library, yet to preserve the peace of the balance they voted for the expulsion of the books. One gentleman who prides himself on his knowledge of parliamentary usages and caters to the church power for the sake of popularity, in his objections to Mr. Jamieson's book, said he knew the author of that book to be an immoral man; he once heard him lecture, and immediately after, in the same place, two or three men ran away with other men's wives as a result of his teaching. As to Paine's work, he did not see so much that was objectionable, and yet he considered it a very immoral work, and those who adopted his belief were also immoral. You may be sure the debate was warm, and there were only a few who held out firm to the end. Well, to make a long story short, their opposition was so firm that they finally succeeded in voting the books out.

We then concluded we would establish a library of our own, which should hav a platform broad enough for all and every one who chose to stand upon it without jostling his neighbor. So we organized ourselves into the Orange City Public Liberal Library Association, with eighteen members.

Times are hard, and we are poor, as Liberalists and Spiritualists are apt to be; but we must read, and we wish to make our funds go as far as possible.

There is a strong Liberal element here, but a great many hav a mortal horror of Mrs. Grundy But I think most of them will be able some time to think for themselves without consulting the old lady. My husband and myself hav, almost single-handed, combated the church element and been denounced in no measured terms for our avowed Spiritual belief, or knowledge rather; but I think we hav conquered standing room, which we intend to maintain. I hav prolonged my letter beyond my first intentions, so will close for the present. Truly yours, MRS. T. D. GIDDINGS.

RATHMINE, IRELAND, April 4, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: The banner of freedom shall yet wave in our land. Charles Bradlaugh returned for Northampton, England! He is the greatest champion of Freethought and mental liberty in Great Britain. He declines to take the oath of allegiance, as it involves the recognition of a supreme (supernatural) being. I trust you will not fail to notice this in your paper. Bradlaugh is well known in the states.

J. WILSON.

LE CLAIRE, IOWA, April 19, 1880.

MRS. BENNETT, Dear Madam: Inclosed please find $2 from treasury of Barber's Creek Liberal League, Rapids City, Ill. This small contribution to the Bennett Reception fund is a token of appreciation and sympathy toward the leader, author, hero, martyr, D. M. Bennett. Our League is composed of members on both sides of the Mississippi river, and we claim to be the link uniting the great chain of auxiliaries East and West. As such, we send fraternal greetings and desire to be kindly remembered at the Bennett Reception at Chickering Hall, May 2d.

MARIA FOLLETT, Sec. B. C. L. L.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: At a recent meeting of Spiritualists and Liberals Mrs. Colby said: "Can you find a record of modern manifestations more startling than of Saul and the woman of Endor? What minister dares say it is not true? Not one. Did she tell the truth? Who dares deny that?"

Now I deny that the old witch ever raised Samuel, or anything else; and my authority is Josephus, and I think he is as good authority as the Bible.

Yours respectfully, ALEXANDER LANSING.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., April 26, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Inclosed please find check for $12 to the order of D. M. Bennett, which, with the $1 previously remitted, makes $13. As it was my intention at first to join those who make up the Parton fund, I still adhere to the proposed sum, but prefer now to contribute this money for another purpose, by which I think our friend Bennett will be more benefited in the end and his paper given a larger circulation. My desire is to distribute THE TRUTH SEEKER among such of my friends as are likely to become subscribers, and I therefore propose to pay with the inclosed sum the subscription price for two copies of your paper for one year, from April 1st, and for eight copies for three months, from May 1st. You will please forward to my address the desired numbers from April 1st, and of May 1st. I will inform you as soon as practicable of the address of my friends to whom you will in future mail direct.

Hoping soon to hav the pleasure of saluting Mr. Bennett as a free man once more, I send him my best regards, and remain, Yours truly, A. C. C. TAMSEN.

BOSTON, MASS, April 19, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: If my contributions to THE TRUTH SEEKER hav been crude, poor sentiments and poorer writing, you will credit them with the one merit of being short. To-day is the anniversary of the Battle of Lexington, when our honored ancestors fought for their freedom from kingcraft and priestcraft. The former has found its eternal tomb, from which no amount of Christian faith can resurrect it. But priestcraft, that slimy crawling thing, has raked hell—their Slough of Despond, the Red Sea of bloody persecutions, and their Dead Sea of lifeless forms—to gather the wrecks of false and inhuman systems, and, kiln-dried by the ecclesiastical hell fires, with them is kindling anew the flames of persecution.

Infidelity, to the rescue! or the American eagle, the symbol of freedom, will fold its wings, and the world will be rolled into the past again, with the fitting emblem of an owl perched upon a leafless tree or church spire, restless at the approach of day. But the augmenting army of Infidels is a hopeful prophecy for the future peace and prosperity of this favored nation.

The imprisonment of D. M. Bennett by the Christians is like the man who struck a mortal blow on his own head for fear some one else would kill him. They hav unwittingly advertised for the Liberals, and hav furnished ample recruiting ground for them. They are going headlong into the pit of their own digging.

Well, Mr. Editor, I hav just weaned off from the church, and hope to soon become a full-fledged Liberal. The Bibleites hav Pharisees who will yet be overwhelmed in the Red Sea of troubled reflections. They hav a Pilate who "washes his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person. See ye to it [the courts]; I will not interfere." Will not the same odium attach to the modern as to the ancient Pilate for the act of cowardice? Two hundred thousand won't save a modern truth proclaimer. But the Barabbases of modern times, who can count them? Surely history repeats itself. The Christians of the nineteenth century are rivals in barbarity of the Jews of the first century.

The subsidized Executive has made a blot on our history for which he can never atone. "Father, forgive them," is in order, but the plea of ignorance is ruled out, for they know what they do. In conclusion (and for fear I shall forfeit my claim to brevity), I would warn Liberals against hen-pecked Presidents and Christian judges, and elect men who hav honor; men who will not giv our boasted free government a lie. JOSEPH L. SPINNER.

EAST DUBUQUE, ILL., April 19, 1880.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I am happy to believe that you are soon to enjoy the sweets of freedom; to roam where you please; to breathe the free and sweet air of heaven; to receive the happy and hearty greetings of warm, sincere, and happy friends. And though I fail, through the infirmities of old age, to put in an appearance at your Reception, be assured that I will be with you with mind and spirit, invoking the choicest blessings of earth and man for your present and future happiness. Be pleased to accept this as the frank and sincere expressions of a true friend, and the inclosed "X" as a small portion of what man's blessing should be. Respectfully, fraternally, and truly,

Your friend, D. R. BURT.

CONCORDIA, KAN., April 21, 1880.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I write to congratulate you upon the near approach of the end of your incarceration in the bigots' prison; and to offer you all the assistance within my power to render to carry on the work of emancipation in the future. We are in the midst of the battle; and it may be that the hottest fight has not yet been made. I hav participated in one war, and am ready for another.

Always yours truly, O. A. PHELPS.

LE MARS, IOWA, April 23, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I inclose post-office order for $5 00, for which send to my address one copy of "Nature's Revelations of Character;" the balance place to my credit to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Although my time does not expire until July next, yet I think it a good time now, just as our martyr-editor is about to be released from unjust confinement, for all Liberals to renew their subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER; that the old hero may hav an earnest of our determination that his paper shall liv and flourish in spite of crafty Christian efforts to "stamp it out." It is a duty we owe ourselves, as well as him, that we see to it that THE TRUTH SEEKER, the paper the Young Men's Christian Association sought through his imprisonment to crush, shall not languish for want of material support. I hope his Reception at Chickering Hall will prove a grand success, still I fear the end is not yet. I watch with some anxiety the next move in the Christians' prosecuting programme. Should they permit him to resume his editorial duties, without further molestation, I shall feel absolutely certain they hav had a change of heart, and also feel more than glad to know his fearless pen is again at liberty to champion the cause of free speech, free press, and especially free mails, in that good time coming when there shall be no official sneak of the Comstock stripe to interfere.

Respectfully, L. W. SIBLEY.

CHICAGO, ILL., April 19, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, My Dear Sir: Allow me to add my voice in congratulating you upon your release from prison, where you hav been expiating the punishment inflicted by the persecutors of religious and civil liberty, when martyrs are called for they always will be found. Are we not in this country fast approaching the condition of France in the terrible days of the supremacy of the Bastile? Go forward and fear no danger, for you are in the right. Fraternally, Z. T. GRIFFIN.

FORT LEE, N. Y., April 25, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed one dollar toward the expenses of the Reception of our hero, D. M. Bennett.

The time is rapidly coming when those bigoted men now in power will be stricken down for their tyranny by the will of the people.

My health will not permit me to be present at the Reception, but my son and two friends, who represent founders of a new League, will be present. Your old friend,

AUG. SEMMENDINGER.

HENDERSON, N. C., April 23, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: At the late session of the North Carolina Legislature the House of Representatives expunged from its record, by a unanimous vote, the resolution of expulsion it passed against me five years ago.

North Carolina is making rapid progress in Liberalism. Some of the most eminent men here are outspoken Liberals. Republicans here are all for Grant. The state will surely go Republican next fall. My congratulations to Mr. Bennett on the near approach of his liberation. J. W. THORN.

HANCOCK, MD., April 12, 1880.

DEAR EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 75—$1 50 to pay what I owe and to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER and 25 cents to pay for a copy of M. Babcock's little book entitled "Superstition; or, The Religion of Believe or be Damned," which you will mail to my address as early as convenient.

The reason I am behind with my subscription is this: I went West last November, about two weeks before my first three months' subscription had expired, intending to renew my subscription when I reached my destination; but when I arrived there I found that the people were all so superstitious and bigoted that it would be detrimental to my interests to take such a paper, for I am poor and hav got to humble myself a little. When I came home, a few days ago I found a lot of TRUTH SEEKERS and a letter from you. I will distribute the paper and try to increase its circulation in this section; but even that will be attended with danger, for Infidels are scarce here and bigotry and fanaticism "rife in the land," and a young friend of mine is in danger of being tarred and feathered, merely for daring to think for himself. But I think we are gaining ground inch by inch, and after a time we will hav superstition under our feet.

Yours for truth, J. D. STOTTLEMEYER.

ALTOONA, PA.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: After the unfair trial that was given you in the city of New York last year, and after the cruel and unjust imprisonment that was imposed upon you, by which you were separated from your family and friends and compelled to serve out eleven months in a prison cell, I take this method of sending you my most hearty congratulations, also those of the other few brother Liberals who reside in the orthodox city of Altoona.

We are unable to attend the Reception, but we feel as enthusiastic as if we could be present and take you by the hand. We feel glad of your return safely once more to your family and place of business. You will once again enjoy the blessed light of liberty and occupy the same place that you filled so faithfully in the past. We hope that you may yet hav a bright and prosperous future before you, that you may still be able to do greater work in the service of humanity, and that you may still battle with greater power against the evils of orthodoxy and the delusions of the Christian religion.

It seems strange that the chief executive of the nation should refuse to pardon you after such a long list of petitioners had petitioned him for your release; but no doubt his purely pious wife had a great bearing on him, and he concluded to leave you to your fate.

So you hav served your time out. You hav returned home, and will find more friends than you had when you were taken away. Infidelity has greatly increased over our broad land. The camp-fires are burning brightly, and our army is still moving on, with the old war-horse, Ingersoll, in command. The enemy will soon become weaker as we advance, and a brighter future can be seen in store for us as the mists and clouds of superstition slowly fade away. Therefore, Mr. Bennett, we hope that your Reception will be something long to be remembered, that your health may still continue good, that you may receive our most happy wishes, our earnest congratulations, and a generous welcome home! W. J. BURNS.

ALTON, ILL., April 24, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you two dollars, my mite for the Bennett Reception. How glad I should be if I could be present, that I might grasp the hand of the noble martyr hero, who dared face the bloodhounds of Christianity. Though torn and bleeding, he preserved his manhood, and when pressed by scandal he could not tell a lie. All honor to the great apostle of truth.

Yours truly, D. R. SPARKS.

VALLEY OAK., KY., April 8, 1880,

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Persecuted Old Brother: The circumstances detailed in last week's letter will explain why I hav been so long sending in my subscription. I hav endeavored to register at three of the nearest post-offices, but the reply is, "Out of blanks," and thus it goes, and thus it will go, and thus it must go, so long as a usurping dough-brained scoundrel is President, and a second-rate two-dollar-and-a-half county court lawyer is at the head of the post-office department. The prurient desires Dave Key has continually displayed to show his true nature by smelling into other people's most private affairs show plainly enough the material of which he is made, the cast of his insignificant mind, and how well he succeeded in graduating in that most despicable of all schools, the school of pettifoggerdom.

I inclose $3 to be registered at Somerset. You will hear from me again soon. Continue the paper to my address as at the head of this letter, and print the letter if you wish.

Very truly, M. H. BENTLEY.

SACRAMENTO, CAL, April 11, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Of what good can it be to copy from the Winsted Press, attacking free speech in your issue of the 3d inst. Professing to be a Liberal paper, you will admit of a just criticism. There is a limit to everything under the sun; why should there be none in speech-making or printing? Let every human being apply the maxim, "Do not do unto others what you would not hav others do unto you," and I believe we would all be safe.

Suppose a man would hold up to your face at every turn of the street a rope with the remark that you will be hung if you do not do such and such a thing, but being too cowardly to do it himself, will call a crowd of discontented and poor despairing fellow-men and tell them that such and such a man is the cause of their misery, and that they should erect a gallows and hang him, and when he sees that the men are not as foolish as he thought them to be, to ruin themselves and family, he incites them to riot and arson in the middle of the night, would you not think such a man to be a fool and a dangerous man who ought to be restricted of his liberty until he gets cured? None other but a fool will insist as the Press does that every fool shall hav the right to be foolish, etc., etc. In every civilized country a fool has a right to be foolish only in an insane asylum, and not even there will he be unrestricted.

Denis Kearney has done such things, and not until he has incited to personal violence has he been fined $1,000 and sentenced to six months' imprisonment for speaking his sentiments in public. There is not one paper in a thousand that will side with Denis or fear an abridgement of our liberties by seeing that he is punished for such acts as those above related.

City, county, state, and federal government could stand all the nonsense Kearney was ejecting for the last three years, but he passed the limit when he began to be personal to his fellow-men. The logic of the Winsted Press is not a bit American, and I leave it to you and all candid writers.

It is too often that THE TRUTH SEEKER brings forth such over-zealous Liberalism. It is true that it has generally more good than bad in it, but that is not enough; it ought to seek the truth in all things, and having found it, bring it forth as glaring and overwhelming as possible.

Yours respectfully, HENRY FUCHS.

BENNETT'S DAY.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

On the fourth of March, which is called "Emmet's Day," and is celebrated in honor of the Irish reformer, I wrote an article for our noble TRUTH SEEKER, under the above heading. I do not know what "Uncle Sam's postal folks" did with the letter, but our good editor received it not.

I seconded the suggestion of Mrs. Boozer, that in every city, town, or hamlet where there was a handful of Liberals they should celebrate next May Day, and call it Bennett's Day. Although our loved and loving friend is modest and unassuming, as most truly good and great men are, or should be, yet, for the sake of the grand principles for which he has so nobly suffered, he will allow us the privilege of "making a big fuss over him." We cannot afford to wait until he is dead to appreciate him. Let us make Bennett's Day a national day for all the Liberal Leagues to celebrate throughout the land!

There is something grand and inspiring about commemorative days, when each true soul lays offerings upon the altar of freedom, knowing that at the same moment every other free soul is performing the same sweet duty. Thus may a circle of true men and women, in sympathy, be formed around the globe! Sisters and brothers, do you say amen? SADA BAILEY.

STOCKTON, CAL., April 16, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Welcome to the world again! In some allusions to Pacific coast matters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, very wild and confused ideas occur. One writer thinks that we shall never know what Denis Kearney said to cause him to be fined $1,000, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment in the reform school. The proceedings of the San Francisco courts are published in the daily papers. He who pays for the papers may read. Kearney is reported to hav said, "There is Claus Spreckles, the dirtiest thief that ever went unhung," and, "If anybody plots against my life I will kill him." The former remark was regarded by the court as the most illegal, and he claimed to base the sentence on the gravity of it alone. But it is well known that this speech is not the cause of said sentence. Kearney has been making unpleasant remarks for a couple of years, has threatened to burn Chinatown and San Francisco, hang numerous officials and rich men, wade up to his arms in gore, and drive the Chinese out if he had to destroy the whole state of California. His influence is supposed to hav been very disastrous to the general prosperity of the country, and this sentence was made to squelch him.

W. B. KELSEY.

OAKLAND, ILL., April 20, 1880.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER: I presume it is not saying too much when I infer that old King David was not prouder to receive (at the hands of that death messenger) the news that (unfortunate) Uriah had been cruelly dispatched than I was in obtaining THE TRUTH SEEKER. Several citizens hav perused its precious contents, and matters are so far very encouraging toward raising a club shortly. Every man here that had the good fortune to read the two copies sent me say that they are worth "three-score thousand" times their weight. Please send me copies for the next month, or until I write to you again, which will be ere long.

I see an article in one of those two copies, entitled, "Why don't God Kill the Devil?" In my opinion the question is well put and easily answered. The reason is simply this: He can't do it; he is not man enough for him. There is one thing sure, that were Jehovah to undertake that job, he would not come off as well as he did with old Jake in that memorable wrestling-match. If one or the other must go, let Jehovah perish and the devil liv forever. He is, beyond a reasonable doubt, the most merciful of the two.

As far as "Alpha and Omega" is concerned, I am strongly impressed that, being full of years and wearied to death by his over-exacting hypos, he must soon go the way of all the earth. And my fervent prayer is, the sooner the better.

Would it not be a capital idea to suggest to your many subscribers, especially those who do not preserve your papers, to giv their neighbors a chance at them? There are undoubtedly thousands of people living in the neighborhood of your subscribers who would be pleased to read them, but, unluckily for them, they are too poor to subscribe. Oh, what a pity! Could the opponents of that hydra-headed monster, that infernal hornet's nest, the church, circulate tracts and papers and books free, as it does, I ask where would the gods be now? They would hav been compelled to hunt their caves as their villainous prophet David did.

In deep sympathy for D. M. Bennett, I remain,

Respectfully, J. M. BENOIT.

LONDON, ONT., CAN., April 11, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I congratulate Mr. Bennett on the near approach of his freedom, to again, in person, participate in the dissemination of the principles of Freethought, and trust that his unjust imprisonment will teach a useful lesson to the citizens of the United States on the danger of allowing Christians, or any other religions bigots, too much privilege in what they may consider the discharge of their duties. It is not the followers of any creed that should dictate the laws to promote morality, but the voice of the people by their representatives. And it is an insult to the intelligence of Americans to assume that the large majority would not favor the unrestricted circulation of philosophical and scientific works, which, though perhaps based on erroneous principles, contain theories calculated by the authors to be for the benefit of humanity.

Col. Ingersoll has been lecturing in Toronto, and his appearance in this country has created quite a disturbance in orthodox circles. He was very well received in Toronto, but could not obtain the use of a hall in some other towns. But we must hav patience yet a little time, for the day is near at hand when free discussion on religion will be as common as on any other topic. H. A. THOMPSON.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

[From the Western Reformer.]

is a highly educated and scientific physician. He has an original system of practice, and is perfectly reliable and trustworthy. We hav heard many flattering reports of his successful cures of diseases incident to humanity."

A Few Words About the Devil,

And Other Biographicl Sketches and Essays.

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second editiou, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1 25.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him.—The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $1.75.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to daman the wheels and the springs?

AUTHORITIES.—On Egypt, Wilkinson, Rawlinson's Herodotus, Bunsen; Ethiopia or Abyssinia, Bruce, Baker, Lepsius; Carthage, Heeren's African Nations, Niebuhr, Mommsen; East Africa, Vincent's Periplus, Gulliain, Hakluyt Society's Publications; Moslem Africa (Central), Park, Caille, Denham and Clapperton, Lander, Barth, Ibn Batuta, Leo Africanus; Guinea and South Africa, Azurara, Barros, Major, Hakluyt Purchas, Livingstone.

Assyria, Sir H. Rawlinson, Layard; India, Max Muller, Webber; Persia, Heerens' Asiatic Nations; Central Asia, Burnes, Wolff, Vambery; Arabia, Niebuhr, Caussin de Perceval, Sprenger, Deutsch, Muir, Burckhardt, Burton, Palgrave; Palestine, Dean Stanley, Renan, Dollinger, Spinoza, Robinson, Neander.

Greece, Grote, O. Meller, Curtius, Heerens, Lewes, Taine, About, Becker's Charicles; Rome, Gibbon, Macaulay, Becker's Gallus; Dark Ages, Hallam, Guizot, Robertson, Prescott, Irving; Philosophy of History, Herder, Buckle, Comte, Lecky, Mill, Draper; Science, Darwin, Lyell, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Vestiges of Creation, Wallace, Tyior, Lubbock.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill."—Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—Penn Monthly.

We could scarcely hav supposed it possible for any writer, however gifted, to put into one volume, reasonable in size and price, so much reliable information, sound logic, and inspiring thought.—Literary Review.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health."

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are a liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR in person or by mail FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED.

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth: price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

CONCERNING

Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read ANTIOCHEIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

The Scientific Aspect of Prayer, etc., etc.

VOLUNTARY OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

A lecture replete with eloquence.—San Francisco Chronicle.

She is a powerful advocate of the cause she has espoused.—San Jose Mercury.

Mrs. Lake is the best lady lecturer that has ever appeared before a Portland audience.—Portland Oregonian.

As a speaker she is vastly superior to any woman we hav ever heard; for beauty of diction, depth of thought, and grace in delivery she is remarkable.—Salem (Or.) Record.

She has the power of entrancing her audience, and, by her eloquence, commanding the respect of those most opposed to her.—Corvallis Gazette.

Mrs. Lake is one of the finest orators we hav ever listened to. Can hardly be excelled by any speaker on this coast, either man or woman.—Yreka Journal.

Her eloquence and masterly style giv evidence of a highly cultivated mind as well as a complete comprehension of her subject.—Eureka (Nev.) Sentinel.

Whatever cause she espouses has in her an advocate of more power and brilliancy than is usually found on the rostrum, and her influence will be felt wherever she goes.—Council Bluffs Nonpareil.

Pleasant appearance, graceful carriage, a good elocutionist, eloquent, using well-chosen language to express her ideas.—Clinton Herald.

Mrs. Lake is a brilliant speaker, finely cultured, a trained elocutionist, and a powerful advocate of truth, reason, and constitutional liberty.—Le Claire Pilot.

She may be addressed, Clinton, Iowa.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Prof. Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world. —N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in the world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

The Best on this Theme Yet.

"AN ESSAY ON THE BIBLE NARRATIVE OF CREATION."

By Augustus R. Grote, A.M.

The Boston Commonwealth says: It is a rationalistic examination of the scripture account, with a conclusion that the literal teaching of the theory is injurious to the mind, as it proves an impediment to intellectual advancement.

The Boston Traveler says: He has given a clear, yet condensed, criticism from the literary and scientific points of view. An eloquent and forcible protest against the tyranny of dogma. He endeavors to show that all efforts to reconcile science with a literal interpretation of the account of Genesis must only end in confusion.

The Popular Science Monthly says: The discrepancies between the two accounts are very fully indicated, and the different points of view from which they were written explained. . . . Interesting chapters follow on the myths of the old world, which resemble those of Genesis. . . . The book is characterized by directness of argument, and the best material has been diligently used. . . . The archæologist and philologist will find many new points in the book, which is noteworthy for its additions to science as well as for its distinctive literary merits. Paper 40 cents. For sale by

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY,

BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,

Graduate of the Hygeio-Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.

The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,

141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

Notes and Clippings.

THE venerable Elizur Wright presided at the Bennett meeting on Sunday night. Comstock wasn't there.—Truth.

AMERICA has now nearly one hundred varieties of native grapes under cultivation, and more than eight hundred varieties of pears.

THE Benedictine order of monks has given to the church forty popes, two hundred cardinals, fifty patriarchs, sixteen hundred and thirty archbishops, and numerous canonized saints.

THE Rochester Society of Progress is a German organization to oppose Sunday laws and to favor the taxation of church property. The intention is to establish similar societies throughout the country.

THE Rev. Dr. Armitage is telling the Baptist ministers some plain truths, which they will doubtless profit by. But whom could he hav been alluding to when he said that the Divine Spirit was not pledged to every lazy scoundrel who, from worldly motives, joins the ministry?

A NORWICH botanist, amazed the other day at the rapid growth of a fungus, calculated that it had developed 10,000,000 cells in one day, or 116 cells a second. Prof. Gray, however, cites an instance where a century plant formed 2,000,000,000 cells in twenty-four hours, or 231,481 cells a second.

THE Rev. F. D. Meore, pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Covington, Kentucky, preached that Sunday laws were contrary to the teachings of the Bible and common sense. His Presbytery has voted unanimously that the sermon was heretical, and Mr. Moore has resigned his charge.

THE refusal of Charles Bradlaugh to take the oath, by kissing the Bible, upon his taking his seat in Parliament, is creating not a little excitement on the other side of the water. It is quite probable that the law will be changed so that a man can affirm who conscientiously cannot take the usual Christian oath.

THE Rev. F. W. Handford, of London, Ont., "the most eloquent preacher and popular lecturer in Canada," and pastor of a fashionable Congregational church, is charged with drunkenness, embezzlement, and Beecherism. The accusers are two of his deacons. Handford says he has been indiscreet, but not immoral.

THOUSANDS of tons of Limburger cheese are produced every season, mostly in the states of New York and Wisconsin, at a cost of less than half that of the imported article. It finds its market and is consumed mostly by our German-American population. It is more profitable to the farmer and maker than any other kind of cheese, because from a given quantity of milk more weight is obtained and better prices are realized.

A GERMAN physician claims to hav discovered a means of dyeing the eyes of animals in general, and of man in particular, any color he pleases. He is accompanied on his travels by a dog with a rose-colored eye, a cat with an orange-red eye, a monkey with a chrome-yellow eye, a negro with one black and one blue eye, and a negress with one eye gold-colored and the other silver-white. The doctor says that his process, instead of injuring, strengthens and improves the sight.

COMSTOCK protests too much. Whenever he gets spanked in one of his prosecutions, he protests. And now he protests insultingly against the decision of Commissioner Allen in discharging Mr. Williams. It is, perhaps, more fortunate for Mr. Comstock than he imagines that Mr. Williams was not driven to a trial. It is shrewdly surmised that all the evidence for the defense was not developed at the examination before Commissioner Allen, and if it had been, Mr. Comstock would probably hav protested more vehemently than ever.—Truth.

THE vast and respectable audience that attended the reception of D. M. Bennett on Sunday night proves that there is an immense respectable element in New York that is opposed to the practice of Anthony Comstock in interfering with Freethought literature, upon the pretense that it is indecent. That audience could never hav been collected to welcome a man who had just emerged from state prison, unless the man represented in his suffering an unpopular idea which they approved and they certainly did not approve indecency.—Truth.

Rev. W. L. Johnson of Burlington, Vt., for seven years a member of the Vermont conference of the Methodist church, a year ago was compelled by ill health to temporarily giv up his work. He tried to practice medicine, and unsuccessfully sought a position in New York. Unable to pay for a birth on the steamboat Drew, he had been forced to sleep with the deck passengers, and, moved by a desire for revenge, he pilfered towels and napkins from the state-rooms of passengers. He was arrested at Albany, but discharged as he was very penitent.

IF the dove of peace is hovering over the Brooklyn Presbytery, it must be at a great hight. In a published letter, the Rev. Dr. Van Dyke accuses one of his Talmagian brethren of telling infamous falsehoods: apropos of one of these, he inquires whether it is creditable that the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, when sitting in Talmage's Tabernacle, consumed nine gallons of wine at a single celebration of the Lord's Supper; and he expresses in closing an earnest hope that the Presbytery will at last "see the necessity of putting a stop, if possible, to the persistent falsehoods by which the very name of the Presbyterian church in this city is covered with disgrace in the sight of God and man."

IT is rumored that the pope is about to issue, or has issued, a papal manifesto based on the political struggle in Ireland. It seems that the supreme pontiff has, according to his instructions, been kept informed by telegraph of the course and progress of public affairs over there, and that he has been profoundly impressed by the unprecedented success of Mr. Parnell's war with the priesthood. The Parnell victories are considered to mark a new departure in the relations of the priests and their flocks. The Vatican is expected in this crisis to thunder against Mr. Parnell and his lieutenants as revolutionary propagandists, whose aim is to transplant to Irish soil continental socialism and Infidelity.

A WRONG MODE OF PUNISHMENT.—Whatever there may hav been wrong in the publications of Mr. D. M. Bennett, we believe the mode of his punishment was utterly wrong and inexcusable. He was imprisoned a year in the Albany penitentiary for circulating certain printed matter through the United States mails. Now, to allow an espionage by the government over the mails, for a purpose however pure and good, is to do away with freedom of speech and of the press, and to surrender our liberties. In fact, a government censorship of the mails is one of the most hateful species of oppression a free man can conceive of. If it can be used for one purpose it can be used for any other. The very idea is wholly incompatible with liberty. Such a law would never hav been allowed to find its way on the statute book in the early days of our history. And we do not believe it will be long tolerated now.—Sun.

IT must surprise people to hear of a minister's resigning his pastorate and giving up the preaching of the gospel because he has come to the conclusion that he is not a Christian. But that was the reason the Rev. George Chainey, a Unitarian minister, recently gave for resigning the charge of a church in Evansville, Indiana. He startled his congregation on a recent Sunday by announcing that he was not a Christian, and that, inasmuch as his church declared itself Christian, it was plainly his duty to hand in his resignation as its pastor. He shows that he is an honest man in giving up the charge of a Christian church when he finds he is no longer a Christian. He also shows that he is—what few men are—an honest critic of himself. If everybody tested his religious belief and his religious practice by the Christian standards as they are laid down in the New Testament, and accepted the result with equal candor, perhaps, instead of being a remarkable exception, the Rev. Mr. Chainey would find he was lost to sight in the crowded ranks of the majority.—Sun.

"THE Rev. Joseph Cook, after going on the stage and in the presence of the audience, demanded his pay before proceeding with his lecture. It was the first case of the kind that had ever happened with the Young Men's Association, and it was the cause of the little delay in the proceeding." The above item is from the La Porte (Ind.) Argus of April 20, 1880, The association referred to is the Young Men's Christian Association, I send it to you thinking perhaps you might be willing to use it in making a point against the champion liar of modern times. The politeness of Mr. Cook's conduct is nothing to speak of, but then he knew the class of men he was dealing with, and that if they were anything like himself they would not let a good chance to take a mean advantage of some one escape. I hav seen no dispatch from New York as to your release. I hope soon to know that you are free and once more in a position to pour hot shot into the camps of the Philistines. Fraternally yours, —R. P. L.

AMONG those who identify themselves with the Protestant Christian religion of the present day, which, by the way, is the residuum left of the religion Jesus taught, after a distillation of the latter through heathen ceremonies, Catholic creeds, and Puritan bigotry, and bears no more resemblance to it than a bad counterfeit dollar to the genuine, attendance at the sanctuary is regarded as a necessary means of grace. And yet no wealthy congregation in New York assembled yesterday morning or evening before whose house of worship there were not liveried coachmen waiting patiently for their masters and mistresses to emerge from the presence of their Master and a contemplation of his divine goodness. Presumably there must be some provision in the divine plan for the salvation of this lower grade of mortals—perhaps a little heaven for servants, whose portals may be passed without a weekly attendance at the sanctuary of the Lord or a communion with his saints on earth.

PROBABLY the most remarkable assemblage of sun spots that has appeared for several years is now visible north of the sun's equator. The spots extend in a row, approximately parallel with the equator, over a distance of about 140,000 miles. They are congregated into five principal groups, which comprise the largest spots, are surrounded by enormous penumbræ, or rings of shade. About the largest spots, and scattered along between the groups, are smaller spots in great numbers, some so minute that a high telescopic power is required to show them. Around the whole wonderful procession, in which about thirty spots were counted recently, and for thousands of miles on each side of it, the surface of the sun is heaped up into those ridges of light that the astronomers call faculæ. A good view of these spots may be obtained with an ordinary telescope magnifying twenty-five times. When seen with an astronomical telescope their appearance is startling, especially when their images are thrown upon a screen in a darkened room. These images can be enormously magnified; then, by a kind of stereoscopic effect, they strikingly resemble the vast sun caverns they represent.

THE decision of Commissioner Allen in the complaint made against Edward F. Williams, of Greenpoint, who was accused of mailing an indecent letter, is perfectly just. The Commissioner holds that as the letter was sealed and inclosed in an ordinary envelope, and was not seen by any one except the author until it was received and opened by the person to whom it was addressed, it does not come under the act of Congress excluding from the mails letters upon whose envelopes improper language is written. Accordingly he dismisses the complaint without going into the merits of the evidence that has been offered respecting the authorship of the letter. This, we say, is a sound and just decision. It is high time that every form of government espionage and every kind of peeping into the inner contents of documents sent by the mails were entirely abolished. If government agents can be allowed to inquire into what is inside of sealed papers that are committed to the post-office, and to reject them for any one reason, they can do so for any other reason; and presently they will be determining that the political sentiments or the social views of such documents are such that they must be excluded and their writers punished; and when it comes to this, what remains of individual freedom will not be worth much. This thing should be stopped. Liberty may hav its inconveniences and its evils, but the methods now employed to check them are infinitely worse than they, and more intolerable.—Sun.

Home Again.

DEAR FRIENDS AND READERS: I am glad to announce to you that I am once more at home and seated in the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER. No longer are bars and bolts shutting me out from the free air and sunshine which nature so freely bestows upen all. No longer am I debarred from the society and intercourse of dear and loved friends. No longer do keepers and overseers restrain me from the freedom to which I am justly entitled. No longer do they order me where to direct my eyes, how to hold my hands, how I must step with my feet, when and what I must eat, when I must lie down, when I may get up, when I may speak, when I must not speak, when I may write to friends, when I may read the letters which friends send me, with the great privilege of having the opening and the first reading of them. No longer do prison rules control me. No longer is the eye of surveillance and stern authority constantly upon me. I hav served out the unjust sentence pronounced upon me by an unjust court, and no longer is the heel of the government of this great and so-called free country pressing upon my neck. No longer is it crushing from me the breath, the life, and the liberty to which, as a dutiful citizen of this republic, I am justly entitled. No longer do I wear the convict's garb. No longer are the chains of servitude fettering my limbs. No longer are locks and bolts restraining me. I am once more a free man!

Thursday, the 29th of April, was the day of my liberation. As early as eight in the morning Deputy-Superintendent Powers notified me that my term of imprisonment was over. My books, papers, letters, certain articles of wearing apparel, bedding, etc., were taken to the main hall of the prison and packed in a commodious trunk, furnished by my kind friend Mrs. Van Allen. I laid off, for the last time, the felon's garb and donned a brand new suit of citizen's clothes, which my wife had brought me. Soon after nine the big lock of the hall was opened and I was permitted to step forth from the prison proper into the large reception and visiting-room, called the "guard-room." Here my friends, Daniel E. Ryan, Chairman of the Reception Committee, E. B. Foote, Sr., M.D., Elder G. A. Lomas, his friend, John Dye, Jay Chapel, and others, were awaiting me. Hearty hand-shakings and congratulations were the first thing in order. A little speech from the Chairman of the Reception Committee was responded to in a few grateful words, and I gladly placed myself under the Committee's protection in place of the control of the prison officials.

My wife was anxiously awaiting me in the superintendent's private apartments, and upon my being conducted there we were soon locked in each other's embrace. Kind farewells were spoken to me by the members of the superintendent's family and the officers of the prison. Many good wishes were expressed for my future health and happiness, and many kindly hopes heartily pronounced. We parted in friendship and perfect good will. For years to come I will not forget the kindnesses which during my prison life were received from Superintendent McEwen's family. The committee had a carriage in waiting at the door; the good-byes were quickly and heartily spoken, and we soon rolled away from the Albany Penitentiary, never, I trust, to enter its walls again.

As the express train for this city did not leave till 2:40 P. M., we had more than four hours to spend in looking around the city, calling upon friends, etc. Among other places, we visited the new Capitol building—a most magnificent and costly pile—and spent a little time both in the Senate and Assembly Chambers. As the Legislature was in session, we listened awhile to the process of law-making. In the Assembly the taxation of reservoir or church property was being debated. We learned none of the members' names, but speeches were made, pro and con. We were amused by the amendment to an amendment offered by a venerable, intelligent-looking member—after a sharp speech in favor of equal taxation—to the effect that "property of all kinds be free from taxation!" It of course did not pass, though if church property is free from taxation, in justice all other property ought to be.

After partaking of an excellent dinner with our dear friends, Mr. and Mrs. Van Allen, they accompanied us to the depot, where we found Elder Lomas and others in waiting. Among the friends who called to bid me good-bye were Father Maurice Bierl, the Catholic clergyman of St. Francis' church and one of the chaplains of the prison. He came quite a distance, from the upper part of the city, to see me off. I spoke in my last letter of this genial, educated, kind-hearted gentleman, with whom during my prison life I formed a friendship which I trust will be of lelong duration. He is a man for whom I entertain a very high respect, one who has less bigotry and less superstition and intolerance than almost any clergyman I have ever met.

We arrived here in New York at a little past seven in the evening, and found, upon stepping from the cars, a large number of friends waiting to receive us, and whom I was very glad indeed to see. Less than half an hour was spent in hand-shaking, congratulations, and making me welcome home, when we took the carriage provided by the Reception Committee, which conveyed us to THE TRUTH SEEKER office. All the attaches of THE TRUTH SEEKER were in waiting. The office was illuminated, speeches were made, songs sung, toasts given, etc. California wine in reasonable quantity was placed upon the large imposing-stone in the composing-room, and I found a wineglassful did me no harm, it being the first drop of wine or beverage of any kind I had tasted for nearly a year. The Reception Committee held a meeting in Science Hall building, which I attended. Welcomes were extended from many friends, and my right arm was nearly lamed with hand-shaking. It was really most pleasant to be home again and to meet so many friends who have so kindly borne me in remembrance.

Friday and Saturday I spent largely in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, sitting at my old table, examining correspondence, writing a few letters, but mostly receiving and conversing with numerous friends, of this city and adjoining states, who called to speak words of welcome and to congratulate me upon my restoration to freedom. Nearly all also congratulated me upon my vigorous good health, and that I had escaped durance vile without falling a prey to sickness or disease. It is most agreeable to take so many kind friends by the hand, and to know that their joy and friendship are real and not assumed. The change indeed is great from my condition for the past eleven months. Now, may my enemies let me alone and allow me to pursue my legitimate business in peace!

THE BENNETT RECEPTION.

Honor to a Returned Prisoner,

CHICKERING HALL, SUNDAY EVENING, MAY 2D.

A GRAND OVATION.

Before the hour of seven had arrived, and ere the doors were opened a large number of people had gathered around the entrance to the building awaiting admission. As soon as the doors were opened the seats of the fine, capacious hall filled rapidly with anxious ladies and gentleman who had come out to do honor to one whom the powers of the church had sought to crush and disgrace.

Among those forming the audience were many from distant cities and other parts of the country. Many were present from Boston, Springfield, Newark, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Harrisburg, Reading, Rochester, and one or two from the state of Illinois. Long before the hour of eight arrived the seats were filled, hundreds were standing up, and large numbers were unable to obtain admittance.

At 7:30 the splendid organ began to discourse most excellent music, after which the quintette—Mrs. Virginia Macdonald, Mrs T. R. Stevens, Miss Ida Moore, W. H. Palmer, Frank Lockhart—sang in excellent style to the air of "John Brown's body," etc., the following words by Dr. Caleb S. Weeks.

THE LIGHT COMES FLOWING ON.

AIR—John Brown.

Awaking manhood rises, freed from all its dreamy fear,
With senses opened freely nature's truth to see and hear,
Withdrawing all its rev'rence from the creeds that interfere
As light comes flowing on.

CHO.—Glory, glory, hallelujah!
Glory, glory, hallelujah!
Glory, glory, hallelujah!
The light comes flowing on.

And though the priestly forces seek to bar the coming day,
And on our morning prophets all their bigot-wrath display;
Their prison walls no more suffice to hide the deep'ning gray
As light comes flowing on.

CHO.—Glory, glory, etc.

In half-despairing efforts persecution now must veil
Itself in false pretenses when the truth it would assail;
Its weak'ning joints are showing through its borrowed suit of mail
As light comes flowing on.

CHO.—Glory, glory, etc.

We spurn its coward vengeance—we will boldly take our stand
Against all lawless "legal" acts profaning freedom's land—
To manly courage branded crime we'll give the cheering hand
As light comes flowing on.

CHO.—Glory, glory, etc.

We welcome home our martyr friend—the hero of to-day—
The conqueror that while in chains kept bigot-foes at bay,
And helped us raise our eyes in joy to greet the grand display
Of light now flowing on.

CHO.—Glory, glory, etc.

Loud and continuous applause followed the singing.

T. C. Leland read the names of the following officers, Hon. Elizur Wright, President. Vice Presidents: A. L Rawson, New York; Charles Bradlaugh, M.P., England; James Parton, Massachusetts; Parker Pillsbury, Massachusetts; Courtlandt Palmer, Connecticut; Amy Post, New York; Hon. George H. Hall, Missouri; Horace Seaver, Massachusetts; Hon. Stephen Brewer, New York; Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, New York; Prof. Wm. Denton, Massachusetts; Mrs. Elizabeth M. F. Denton, Massachusetts; Dr. T. L. Colby, New York; S. B. McCracken, Michigan; A. J. Glover, Illinois; Dr. T. A. Lamb, Maine; J. S. Verity, Massachusetts; Henry Damon, Massachusetts; John P. Jewett, New Jersey.

At a few minutes before eight the President, the Hon. Elizur Wright, of Boston, led off with the following opening address:

SPEECH OF HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: We meet in the name of common sense and a common humanity—friends of law who protest against the perversion of law. We wish to express our sympathy with a man who, under the ægis of the Constitution, for his free thought, and free speech has fallen into the clutch of the old theological octopus that ought to have died a hundred years ago, that lovely old mollusk that thinks there is no salvation outside of its own soft suction pump.

What is law worth without liberty? What is government worth when it leaves no room for self-government? What is religion worth, which seeks to save men by faith in the unknowable, and exacts faith by penalty? What is enforced morality worth? What is man worth when reduced to a machine?

Since the Dred Scott decision there has been nothing to my knowledge so disgraceful to the United States as the trials, or rather persecutions, of E. H. Heywood and D. M. Bennett. The expiration of Mr. Bennett's term of imprisonment is the proper occasion to ask the people of the United States what has been gained by this violation of the liberty of the press, this assumption of jurisdiction belonging to the states and never granted to the general government.

The punishments for witchcraft and blasphemy in Massachusetts are not remembered to her credit. Giles Corey and Abner Kneeland could live there in peace if they should reappear to-day. They were punished in the interest of a certain religion and in obedience to a certain book. Is that religion the stronger, or that book the more reverenced, by reason of their sufferings?

It is pretended that Heywood and Bennett were punished in the interest of morality, not for any criminal act committed, but for words having an immoral tendency. It was not Bible morality they offended, for they were not charged with doing or saying anything that could not be fully justified from the pages of that many-sided book. The Bible could not object to their sending "Cupid's Yokes" through the mail without excluding itself—at any rate, not till thoroughly expurgated. Good morals, including truthfulness, honesty, generosity, patriotism, self-government, and so on, are incalculably important. They are the most excellent fruits of liberty—not of penal laws, but of wise maxims, and the knowledge of natural laws.

Says the Constitution of the United States, "Congress shall make no laws abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Whatever the states may do, Congress can not abridge publication on account of immorality. It can not establish any censorship, in the post-office or out of it. Its courts have to interpret its laws, but can only execute such as are constitutional. Consequently as Congress has no right to abridge the freedom of the press by discriminating in any case whatever between moral and immoral publications, the federal courts can make no such discrimination without violating the Constitution. It does not come within their province—except by usurpation.

And this is the most dangerous because the most comprehensive of all usurpations. It murders freedom of thought, on which the virtue and happiness if not the existence of the nation depend.

Doubtless Congress has a right to regulate the mail service, but not in regard to the moral character or tendency of the matter conveyed by it, which it could not possibly do without more or less abridging the freedom of the press. Indeed, as paper and ink have no moral character or tendency, good or bad, in themselves, they hav none while in the care of the United States, within the mails. It is only outside the mails, and in the hands of individuals, that they can have any. And those individuals, for any crime they may commit, or bad influence they may exert, by the use of the said paper and ink, are not under the jurisdiction of the United States, but of the states, or local governments where they may happen to be. Must the United States make it penal to send a doctor's lancet through the mail because the receiver may be a quack and bleed his patients to death with it? Shall the liberty of the press be overthrown by indirection? Better do it directly. Better punish the cutler for making the lancet before he has a chance to mail it.

Admitting what the Attorney-General of the United States did not claim to be true in the case of "Cupid's Yokes," to wit, that the pamphlet is obscene, and that the government has a right to exclude obscenity from the mails, it does not follow that Congress has a right to exact a penalty, or the United States courts to indict for the mailing as a crime. The utmost that Congress—if it can with any precision define obscenity—has a right to do is to instruct postmasters to exclude any unsealed package containing it. Any party thus aggrieved would have his remedy in the federal courts. The post-office department would thus clear itself of any participation in crime, and throw the responsibility of punishing it on the local government, where it belongs. And for this purpose excluded packages should be placed in the hands of the proper local authorities. One can easily see how likely a real criminal would be to seek a remedy for his grievance in the federal courts. The only possible objection, on the part of religious persecutors, to such a law would be that it would not serve their purpose.

A law which unconstitutionally exacts a penalty, a law which must be practically inoperative without a lying decoy, a law so indefinite in its terms that a court so disposed may so interpret it as to exclude from the mails a great part of the world's most valued literature, deserves to be resisted and defied by every man and woman in America.

It makes no odds how disreputable or fanatical in other respects, or in regard to obscenity itself, the violater of such a law may be, the good citizen should stand by him. The more unpopular and unsavory he is to the public, the greater the danger involved in his unjust punishment or punishment by an usurped jurisdiction. A good citizen will defend even a known murderer from punishment by lynch law. Under what is well called "the Comstock law" the deserved punishment of a real obscenist is little else than the administration of justice by an ecclesiastical mob which overawes the constitutional government. If the attention of the good people of the United States could be aroused to what is really going on under the name of suppressing vice, they would at once see it almost infinitely important that the vilest wretch that ever blasphemed human nature with his obscenity should be punished only by the proper local tribunal.

But we have seen men whose good motives and decency of language are undeniable punished for a mere difference from the generally received opinions on an open question of morals. No matter what indiscretions they may have committed, or what erroneous opinions they may hold, it is inexcusable—it is treachery to our free institutions, it is treachery to law itself—not to stand by the victims of such injustice. We by no means countenance their indiscretions or their errors by doing so. Probably no one ever lived up to his own ideal of perfection, either as man or animal. It is hard to draw the line between food and poison, fact and fancy, right and wrong; hard to do it for one's self, still harder to do it for others. All make more or less mistakes. Some mistakes have lasted for ages, and been well-nigh universal. Even the most rigid Presbyterians have to excuse Washington for very emphatical profane swearing at the then colonies for allowing his and their army to freeze and starve after they had declared their independence. A more famous and more generally beloved and lovable person still, when he was but moderately hungry, cursed a poor innocent fig-tree for having nothing on it but leaves—an obvious weakness in a man, but strangely supposed to be all right if he himself made the tree.

The people who most differ from Mr. Bennett's views in regard to theology have the most reason to thank him for the lesson his imprisonment is teaching them of the impossibility of advancing their opinions or suppressing his by penal inflictions. If they have not thoroughly learned the lesson they must blame their own stupidity or inattention.

I feel sure that if the men and women who agree with Mr. Bennett's views of theology were in the majority, not only would the morals of the people generally be better than they now are, but the majority would not ask for penalties to suppress contrary opinions. When that good time comes, the people who may then still cling to the "ancient faith" will be welcome to the comfort of believing that "divine providence" has brought their good out of this evil. But they may be assured, now and here, that we Liberals shall never desire any more martyrdom on either side. Martyrdom never did and never will prove the truth of any doctrine—of which no man is more sensible than Mr. Bennett.

Mr. Bennett professes to be a seeker for truth, which implies that he has not found the whole of it. No man has. It is an arduous search. The first thing a genuine seeker finds is a good deal of falsehood, perniciously revered as truth. There are two sorts of falsehoods or lies: 1. Saying what you know to be false. This is the sort patronized by Comstock, Crosby, and Cook. 2. Stating as true what you don't know to be true.

> Some think the world its lying will outgrow
> If all are taught what none can ever know.

This is the ecclesiastical sort, but it may be questioned if it does not breed the other sort. With falsehood of either sort, the truth seeker must necessarily fight or give up his search for the truth. Too many do give it up, being too pacific, should they discover any new truth, to proclaim it in the face of popular falsehood. The world owes its advancement, especially in morals, to exceptional men who ruthlessly attack some popular error. They are never much honored till after they are dead. Then—and it may be hundreds of years after—when grain has taken the place of weeds, their tombs are built of marble and their roughnesses and weaknesses are forgotten. This is why I like to grasp D. M. Bennett's hand before he is dead, and say: Go on, brother. By blasting falsehood in favor of the truth you seek, you have made the world better, including yourself Long may you live to continue it! If the bland and soft-speaking doctors of divinity don't like your sledge-hammer blows, let them discard their barbarous old creeds, morally abominable and demonstrably impossible; and if they must believe in a world beyond this, let them content themselves with the mild and amiable faith of our Spiritualist sisters and brothers, which all of us will be glad to entertain as fast as our brains, time, and opportunities will permit us.

Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, N. Y., read the following letters from persons unable to be present:

LONDON, N. W., April 14, 1880.

THERON C. LELAND, ESQ., Dear Sir: I have this morning received your favor of the 31st with inclosures, which I duly forward to Mr. Conway and Mrs. Besant.

As our Parliament, to which I have just been elected, meets on the 29th of April, it is simply impossible that I can accept the invitation that you send me.

I trust that Mr. Bennett's imprisonment may be the last of its kind in America. The question is not one of approval or disapproval of the particular pamphlet for selling which Mr. Bennett was convicted. It is that all Freethinkers throughout the world are bound to enter their firmest protest against the endeavor to prevent freedom of discussion on social questions by the misapplication of statutes intended to prevent the circulation of objectionable literature, but which ought never to be allowed to apply to the publication of views which, however extreme or wrongful, ought not, by any stretch of malice, be included under the word "obscene."

If the Hon. Elizur Wright should be your president, as I trust he may, please say how cordially I agree with the stand he has taken in this matter.

Yours very sincerely,

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., April 5, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, My Dear Sir: I have received yours of March 30th, inviting me to join in the welcome home which you propose to give Mr. Bennett on his release from prison. You do me great honor. I am obliged to deny myself the gratification of attending the demonstration for a reason which I am sure you would allow to be sufficient. As a general thing I do not care much for demonstrations, but in this instance it becomes everyone to mark in some way his sense of the infamy of the prosecution and sentence of Mr. Bennett. The case involves no abstruse question of law. There is the pamphlet with the passages marked for the jury to consider. Any person of decent intelligence and well-disposed mind can judge the matter as well as the chief-justice of the United States. If the mails ing of such a piece of writing as that exposes a person to fine and imprisonment, then everyone holds his liberty at the mercy of a hireling informer. I trust your demonstration will be all that you anticipate. If it were necessary to its success, I would walk the three hundred miles between this place and New York. Very truly yours,

JAMES PARTON.

STONINGTON, CONN., April 29, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT, CHAIRMAN, My Dear Sir: I shall be unavoidably prevented from attending the meeting at Chickering Hall to celebrate the expiration of D. M. Bennett's term of unjust imprisonment.

The very reason why the bigots put him in the penitentiary is the very reason why I support him, viz, because I differ radically in my opinions from him, from his paper, and from "Cupid's Yokes," for mailing which he was convicted. I, as a lover of fair play, am anxious to protect thought that I oppose as well as thought that I agree with.

I spew obscenity out of my mouth. No one can abominate impurity more than I do. But in no proper sense of the word can "Cupid's Yokes" be called obscene. There is not an obscene word in it. It is an argumentative, physiological, and sociological essay on the relations of the sexes. If it is obscene, then Shakspere is doubly, and the Bible trebly obscene.

It is patent to the most superficial observation that great misery exists both within and without the pale of marriage. Here, if anywhere, is free disussion needed. The author of "Cupid's Yokes" boldly faces the evils he sees, and proposes his remedy, a remedy which is so extreme, and, in my opinion, so destructive of the family that it cannot be applied; but yet I affirm that his book should be welcomed. If it contains any truth let us grant it, while we meet its errors, not with persecution, but with argument, or else in silence.

We cannot have a free country where freedom of thought is denied, and as conditions to freedom of thought, freedom of speech, of the press, and of the mails are essential.

A censorship over our mails, and a system of espionage in our post-office I regard as hateful to republicanism, and consistent only with despotism. Some one condensed the whole subject in the curt inquiry, "Free mails, or moral mails, which?" If moral mails, whose morals? This year Anthony Comstock's; at the next Congress, Cardinal McCloskey's, if a Catholic majority controls; and after that, perhaps, the morals of Ah Sin, if within a few decades the yellow flood from the celestial empire should overwhelm us.

We must nip this tyranny in the bud. If the United States post-office can be secured as the stronghold of some special moral views, it will not be long before the other departments will be similarly controlled, and this accomplished, but one step more for the bigots will be necessary, viz., the imposition of a state religion; whereat, farewell to moral and religious liberty.

In a free country we must have fair trials, and Mr. Bennett's trial was not fair:

1. Because he was judged on separate sentences extracted from "Cupid's Yokes," and thus dissociated from their context, meaning, and spirit. It is as if a man said of his neighbor, "He is a liar under no circumstances," and was quoted as stating, "He is a liar."

2. Bennett's trial was unfair because the testimony of competent experts, literati, and booksellers was ruled out.

3. Because the judge's charge to the jury was so narrow that it would convict any one holding in his library any of the ordinary classic literature.

The whole of Mr. Bennett's sufferings result, in my estimation, in the attempt on the part of the church, to turn detective and police officer. The function of the church is, or should be, moral, advisory, and educative. It is designed to act on the conscience and on that only. To the state alone belongs force and compulsion. Bad enough is it for the state to be obliged to resort to the club of the policeman and the arts of the detective, but for a religious society to undertake such tasks is simply monstrous, yet here we have the lamentable spectacle of this Comstock as agent at once of the Society for the Suppression of Vice and also special agent for the United States post-office. Thus under the cloak of religion (for to all intents and purposes the above society is a religious one) this man is encouraged to invade our private correspondence, and that too when it can only be unearthed by a system of lying and decoy.

Does Christianity begin to realize what it is doing in all this dirty business? Pretending to uphold morals, it is knocking away their very foundation. It is a direct endorsement of lying. It is a resort to the maxims of the Jesuits, "Let us do evil that good may come," or that "the end justifies the means. It is the very apotheosis of deceit. Blinded by this obscenity scare, excellent men like Dr. Crosby are openly upholding deception. Is freedom from obscenity so desirable as to be purchased at the price not only of liberty but also of morality itself? Such is the predicament wherein Christianity stands.

Somehow, for the sake both of church and state, these religio-politico societies must be abolished, and the spiritual and temporal powers must each be freely left to the performance of its own functions. Moral suasion is the only instrument the church needs or should be allowed. Compulsion belongs to the state alone, and should only be exercised through state agencies and officers of state appointment only. The Liberal Leagues must rise in their might, shouting to the church, "Hands off!" In a few years they have risen to number some two hundred. May the good work go on!

Again, I believe these Comstock postal laws, so called, to be unconstitutional, the dictum of the Supreme Court to the contrary notwithstanding. The Constitution simply authorizes Congress "to establish post-offices and post-roads," and nothing more. No moral control is given to it, and the only regulations Congress can make are such as are required for postal and not for moral reasons. The efficiency but not the morality of the post-office is what the government has to consider. The framers of our Constitution well knew that under the common-law jurisdiction of the states, as opposed to the United States, all such questions as obscenity could effectually be taken care of, as they practically have been for one hundred years, till the sapient Mr. Comstock imagined that he could improve on the methods adopted by Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Hamilton, and Jay, and all that great galaxy of intellect and patriotism.

If we allow such invasions of our constitutional rights, our liberties, my dear sir, in your words, are not worth two brass buttons.

I merely add a last thought, which is, that although these postal laws can only be enacted at the price of liberty and morality, they are useless, as the objectionable articles and letters can readily be forwarded by other means—by express agents, etc. The Society for the Prevention of Vice is stirring up all this stench to effect—nothing.

I have said more than enough. Many and able speakers will enter their protests and give their explanations.

Yours, with great respect, COURTLANDT PALMER.

FROM THE EDITOR OF THE "INVESTIGATOR."

PAINE BUILDING, BOSTON, MASS., April 30, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: I congratulate you most sincerely on your release, and sympathize with you in the long, unjust, and cruel punishment you have been doomed to suffer, but I hope it has neither destroyed your health nor impaired your usefulness in our common cause. If it were in my power I should most certainly be at your reception meeting on Sunday evening to which I have been kindly invited by our friend Ryan, and join my voice with that of others in welcoming you to your home and liberty and in protesting against the foul wrong that has been committed upon you under the mockery of law and justice. But unfortunately for me I am not well enough (having been quite sick of late and not yet recovered) to undergo the fatigue of a journey to New York; and besides, I am summoned to attend court next Monday morning to answer to a complaint of T. L. Savage respecting the Paine building, and of course must be there to meet and repel the malice of an enemy who is unceasing in his attempts to injure us, just as he and the ex-priest Charles Ellis have been to crush you.

I hope to live long enough, friend Bennett, to see you get square on these mean, contemptible fellows, and never let go of them until you teach them to their sorrow the bitter lesson of repentance; and, while you are about it, don't forget to lash their equally despicable confederate, Abbot, in the same stringent and deserving manner.

I trust there will be a large and good meeting on Sunday evening to give you a friendly and cordial reception, and hoping that you may have no more trouble after this from Comstock or any other enemy, I close my note with the sincere wish that your last days may be your best and happiest. Mendum bids me send you his kind regards, and to his I add those of Yours very truly, HORACE SEAVER.

FROM J. P. MENDUM.

BOSTON, April 29, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: As circumstances will prevent my being present to congratulate you on your release from prison, permit me to write a few lines, and express my satisfaction that the term of your unjust imprisonment has expired, and that you are again restored to your devoted wife, and to the duties of your office as editor and proprietor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The long confinement imposed on you I trust has not impaired your energies, nor materially interfered with your business. It was fortunate for you that you have had such devoted friends to look after your paper and office during your absence. May the years to come fully compensate you for the injustice which you have suffered. The Liberal public, readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, will bear in mind that in your person, as well as in that of the first editor of the Investigator, Abner Kneeland, bigots and tyrants aimed a deadly blow at the "freedom of the press." I truly congratulate you on your restoration, hoping the patronage of a Liberal public will compensate you for the injuries and losses you have suffered from bigoted sectarian and unjust laws, by a generous support of your publications. Respectfully yours,

J. P. MENDUM, of Boston Investigator.

FROM W. S. BELL.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., April 12, 1880.

MY DEAR LELAND: My arrangements for lectures completed for several weeks in advance will prevent me from joining with you and others in giving a hearty reception to our old martyr friend, D. M. Bennett. Let me assure you that nothing but the imperative demands of my work could prevent me from participating in the public testimony to liberty in the person of D. M. Bennett, which is to be given in Chickering Hall, May 2d. I will be with you in spirit. Long life, successful labors, and unnumbered honors to the hero and martyr of a free press, D. M. Bennett!

Yours fraternally, W. S. BELL.

FROM W. F. JAMIESON.

CHICAGO, ILL.

TO THE BENNETT RECEPTION: Said Thomas Jefferson, "Let the eye of vigilance never be closed." Had that advice of the statesman-hero been heeded, D. M. Bennett would never have been imprisoned. Nobly and cheerfully has he suffered for us—for the sake of liberty. He has been pounding soles for months to enable Christians to walk dry shod. Let us hope our veteran boot bottomer has so well learned his trade that he will pound the bottom out of the orthodox church. Let us Liberals teach the church that the soil of America is forever dedicated to freedom—free thought, free speech, and truth seeking. Let man be true though every god be a liar.

I send a dollar's worth of sympathy per money order.

W. F. JAMIESON.

FROM E. C. WALKER.

NORWAY, IOWA, April 29, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT, Dear Sir: Owing to the uncertainty attending the sending of a message on Sunday, I write these few lines to express my sympathy with and cordial commendation of the object of the meeting over which you will preside on the second of May.

D. M. Bennett to-day steps outside the prison walls, and on the second prox. you, his fellow-citizens, meet in Chickering Hall, to tender to him the meed of your admiration and respect. He stands as the representative of the ideal republic, the republic of religious liberty, of equal rights, of even-handed justice. He was stricken down by the church which stands ever on the alert as the guardian of fossilized ignorance and the conservator of bigoted prejudice, in whatever department of thought or action they may appear. Orthodoxy in religion, orthodoxy in social affairs, and orthodoxy in medicine have combined to crush the last vestige of liberty remaining in our unhappy country. We must organize to defend ourselves, to maintain the freedom of the press, of speech, of the mails, and of action. There is no time to be lost. Let us be up and doing. Give D. M. Bennett a rousing welcome. He is a hero; he is a martyr for us and freedom. Lift high the banner of justice. Demand the immediate, unconditional, and total repeal of the Comstock postal laws. Nothing less than this will meet the requirements of the hour.

Yours for liberty, love, and justice, E C. WALKER.

FROM O. C. LITTLE AND FAMILY.

NEW ALBANY, IND., April 29, 1880.

BENNETT RECEPTION COMMITTEE, GREETING, Friend Liberals: Not being permitted the pleasure of being with you on this glorious occasion, we send you words of joyful greeting from warm hearts, and with you and all Liberals the wide world over we join in doing honor to earth's noblest son, D. M. Bennett, the champion of freedom and true manliness, and while you do him honor in New York we will place our TRUTH SEEKERS on the parlor table, gather all the flowers we can get, weave a wreath, and crown them as noble D. M. Bennett, and shout, Lo, the conquering hero-editor comes, and sing:

Build him a monument, high as the skies.
Broad as the land is and deep as the sea,
That the nations may look on with wondering eyes,
And learn 'tis a glorious thing to be free.
Ay, a monument! glorious monument,
Fame wreathed and garlanded, ne'er to decay.

We cannot find words to express our indignation at his and our persecution, and will ever be with you for the right. Yours for justice,

O. C. LITTLE AND FAMILY.

FROM J. W. BABE AND WIFE.

WASHINGTON, April 30, 1880.

TO THE BENNETT RECEPTION COMMITTEE: Friends of independent thinking, and foes of religious persecution, the Liberals of Washington, D. C., send greeting.

For there are, even in Washington, some whose consciences are not in the keeping of any Right Rev. D.D. in the land, and who believe most thoroughly in free thought, free speech, and a free press.

M. A. BABE,
J. W. BABE.

FROM HENRY APPLETON.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., April 17, 1880.

T. C. LELAND, Dear Sir: Your note informing me of the honor conferred by the Committee on Speakers, relative to the Reception of Mr. D. M. Bennett, is received.

I do not hesitate to express my willingness to co-operate with the movers of this Reception in such way as I can be most useful. Were this a matter simply personal te Mr. Bennett himself, it would have no especial interest to one who is no respecter of persons. Moreover, those who allow any fancied or real weaknesses in Bennett as a man to influence their sympathy with this Reception, forget that in these trying times it is not he that is on trial, but the sacred right to think and impart knowledge. It is only in the fact that in the person of Bennett and others this sacred right of free men must stand or fall that this occasion gathers its chief significance. If the worst man in New York were in Bennett's shoes, it would not excuse a true Liberal from deserting a principle which, when once abandoned, seals the death-warrant of all mental liberty. With renewed thanks for the honor conferred,

Yours very truly, HENRY APPLETON.

FROM THE ROCHESTER LIBERAL LEAGUE.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., April 27, 1880.

TO THE BENNETT RECEPTION MEETING ASSEMBLED IN CHICKERING HALL, NEW YORK, ON MAY 2, 1880: The Rochester Liberal League, by unanimous vote, send to the Bennett Reception meeting most cordial greeting, and with Liberals there assembled unite in words of thankfulness to him who has by a heroism worthy of the cause he advocates earnestly worked and patiently suffered for the sacred right of free thought, free speech, and a free press.

Inspired by the same zeal for the rights of man that animates us all, and by the same admiration for liberty's noble martyr, our President and Secretary will be present at your meeting.

By unanimous vote of the League, April 27, 1880.

A. E. TILDEN, Secretary. AMY POST, President.

FROM A. E. TILDEN.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., April 27, 1880.

TO THE MASS MEETING ASSEMBLED IN CHICKERING HALL, MAY 2, 1880, FOR THE RECEPTION OF D. M. BENNETT: Believing it right that public functionaries and all others should have all the credit and commendation to which their acts entitle them, and approving of what the Nazarine is said to hav directed, that wherever the gospel should be preached in the whole world, the act of the woman who performed a certain service for him should be related as a memorial of her. I therefore propose that whenever and wherever we, the Liberals of the country, have occasion to speak of the judicial administration of Judge Benedict, or of the executive administration of President Hayes, we relate the part they have acted in the trial and imprisonment of our honored guest, D. M. Bennett.

If the part acted by Judge Benedict in his rulings and sentence, and the part acted by President Hayes in refusing the petitions of 200,000 good and loyal citizens for his release from what they considered a cruel and unjust imprisonment were commendable, those functionaries should have the benefit of the honor in the eyes of posterity. If those acts were in themselves good, as the clergy and church say they were, they certainly were much more conspicuously great than the act of breaking a box of costly ointment on the head of the man of Nazareth.

Then let us on all proper occasions, on the rostrum, in the conversational and family circle relate these things, and in every way endeavor to cause them to be remembered and handed down to remote posterity as the crowning acts in the administrations of these two great men. And while doing them justice let not the attitude of the church and the clergy with reference to human liberty be forgotten.

I am proud to have the honor to present my fraternal greeting to the assembled champions of liberty and justice.

A. E. TILDEN, M.D.

FROM THE CAMPBELL HILL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

CAMPBELL HILL, ILL., April 29, 1880

COMMITTEE OF BENNETT RECEPTION, Gentlemen: At a meeting held this day, of the Campbell Hill Auxiliary Liberal League, the officers and members of the society unanimously take this means of expressing joy and satisfaction at the release from unjust imprisonment of the great martyr-champion of free speech, free mails, and free press, D. M. Bennett. And we hope that hereafter he may be so fortunate as to escape persecution; and we desire and believe that the cause for which he has so nobly toiled and suffered will be triumphant in the near future.

It is the desire of every member of this organization that Mr. Bennett continue to press on in the path he has already marked out with such brilliant ability, unmindful of any and all unscrupulous opposers, and that he endeavor, by carefully avoiding mistakes, to leave his name to the Liberals of America as a priceless legacy after he shall have passed away.

DR. H. NEWELL,
A. O. GENUNG,
Committee.

T. C. Leland read a number of telegraph dispatches and short letters from various parts of the country, among which were the following, a portion of which came in and were read later as the meeting proceeded:

FROM THE OTTAWA LIBERAL LEAGUE.

OTTAWA, ILL., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: The world moves, and the Martyr-Hero, D. M. Bennett, is free. OTTAWA L. L.

FROM W. A. GLOVER.

AYLMER, ONT., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: The Liberals of Aylmer, Ont., send hearty greetings and congratulations to Martyr Bennett, and regret their inability to be present at the Reception. W. A. GLOVER.

FROM THE DOWAGIAC LIBERAL LEAGUE.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: Please say to Bro. D. M. Bennett that the Dowagiac Liberal League sends him greetings and a hearty welcome back to liberty and duty, and resolved that we recognize in him an able champion of our liberties, a defender of our rights, and a martyr to the cause of free thought, free speech, and a free press. May he live long to wear the laurels he has so nobly won by fidelity to principle! RICHARD HEDDIN, Pres.

THOS. RIX, Sec.

FROM MR. DOSCHER.

CHARLESTON, S. C., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: May the imprisonment of Mr. D. M. Bennett not have been in vain, and we again enjoy the benefit of the mail. We should not nurse a monarchical censor in our republic. B. DOSCHER.

FROM A CANADIAN FRIEND.

BELLEVILLE, ONT, May 1, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: The lovers of free thought and free press here congratulate Mr. Bennett on his release.

FROM P. V. WISE.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: Greetings! Freedom's apostle, Virtue's lover, Humanity's defender, the just rejoice that he is free again, and that the infamous Comstock and Christian prison is behind him. P. V. W.

FROM I. C. TERRY.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: Bennett himself again! We congratulate him. Let the decree go forth from Chickering Hall this night that the unjust persecution of D. M. Bennett must not be repeated. Demand fair play and equal justice; nothing more and nothing less. I. C. TERRY.

FROM THE PAINE HALL LEAGUE.

BOSTON, MASS., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: The Boston Paine Hall Liberal League congratulates D. M. Bennett on his return to home and liberty, and sympathizes with him in the persecution he has suffered from bigoted enemies and the imprisonment inflicted upon him by an unjust and despotic law, which, for the honor of a professedly free country, we hope to see repealed immediately. HORACE SEAVER, Pres.

FROM PORTAGE CO. LIBERAL LEAGUE.

RAVENNA, OHIO, May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: As friends of the Liberal cause, we send greeting. POTAGE COUNTY LIBERAL SOCIETY.

FROM THE MIDDLETOWN LEAGUE.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: Middletown Liberal League congratulates D. M. Bennett on his release from martyrdom and Comstock & Co. Like your protomartyr, you have risen from a death of persecution to a life of liberty and truth. H. W. NIVER, Pres.

FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: D. M. Bennett's imprisonment is chargeable to Christianity, not to its villainous and contemptible stool pigeons, Benedict, Comstock & Co. Christianity is the religion of despotism, and never allows free speech when it can prevent it. H. L. GREEN.

FROM THE BALTIMORE LEAGUE.

BALTIMORE, MD., May 2, 1880

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: The Baltimore Liberal League welcomes D. M. Bennett on his release from the unjust and unconstitutional imprisonment, caused by his manly defense of free speech, free thought, and free mails.

JAMES C. WHEEDAN, Pres.

FROM THE ALTOONA LIBERALS.

ALTOONA, PA., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: Friends in Chickering Hall to-night, we send our love and high esteem to one who suffered for the right through Comstock's selfish love and meanness.

ALTOONA LIBERALS.

FROM THE ONONDAGA CO. LEAGUE.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: The Onondaga County Liberal League unanimously welcome D. M. Bennett on his return from an unjust imprisonment. JOHN W. TRUESDELL, Pres.
WILLIAM MALCOLM, Sec.

FROM THE SHAWMUT LEAGUE.

BOSTON, May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: Shawmut Liberal League of Boston, now in session, sends greeting to the Bennett Reception in New York. All hail to the chief, the fearless friend of freedom, D. M. Bennett, the "outspoken and open-hearted." Let the fight go on. The sons and daughters of Massachusetts will march on in the ranks under the great banner and motto, THE TRUTH SEEKER, until the victory of free thought, free speech, free press, and free mails is won. GEORGE W. ROWELL,
Secretary.

FROM THE FORT SCOTT LEAGUE.

FORT SCOTT, KAN., May 2, 1880

ELIZUR WRIGHT: Liberals are in session and congratulate Bennett on his liberation from a Christian bastile. Shake his hand for us. V. W. SUNDERLIN, Chairman.

FROM THE PROVIDENCE LEAGUE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: The Providence Liberal League, in meeting assembled, sends its sympathy to Mr. Bennett and congratulations to your meeting.

ELLEN M. BOLLES.

FROM THE NORTHERN IOWA LEAGUE.

WAVERLY, IOWA, May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: The Liberal League of Northern Iowa is in session to-night, passing resolutions in the Bennett case. W. P. MCCORMICK, Vice-President.

FROM THE DETROIT LIBERAL LEAGUE.

DETROIT, MICH., May 2, 1880,

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: To the living martyr of free speech, free press, and inviolate mails the Detroit Liberal League sends greeting. Judicial corruption, religious intolerance, and Christian persecution have spent their force. THE TRUTH SEEKER survives, and D. M. Bennett is free.

U. K BOOTH,
M. S. MATHEWS,
HERMAN JACKSON,
Committee.

FROM JENNIE B. BROWN.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., May 2, 1880.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: I regret exceedingly my inability to attend the Bennett Reception. My sympathies are with you for the freedom of speech and press.

JENNIE BUTLER BROWN.

FROM WM. HENRY BURR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT: Before you take the rattlesnake again by the tail, be sure that you extract his fangs or smash his head. WM. HENRY BURR.

The quintette next sang the following original song of welcome by Mrs. Jennie Butler Brown, of New Haven, Conn; Music by Edwin A. Booth, of New York;

SONG OF WELCOME TO D. M. BENNETT.

Thou victim of unholy laws,
Thou martyr to a noble cause,
Glorious leader of the free,
We gather here to welcome thee.
Wide open swings the prison gate,
While friends of liberty await,
With loving homage justly due,
To clasp hands with the brave and true.

CHORUS.—We to greet thee hither come,
Welcome, brother, welcome home.
We to greet thee hither come,
Welcome, brother, welcome home,
Welcome home, welcome home,
Welcome home, welcome home.

Remembering thy prison cell,
Hearts that are true indignant swell;
While learning more of human need,
We haste with fitting word and deed,
To plant free soil with nobler seed
Than yield the fruits of present creed,
That freedom conquers every foe,
We trust the coming years shall show,

CHO.—We to greet thee, etc.

Unharmed by hatred's heavy chains,
Thy spirit dauntless still remains,
And it may be thy foes shall learn
That ebbing tides shall surely turn;
They to whom was given power,
May long regret the fatal hour,
When smitten in her native land,
Freedom spurns the tyrant's hand.

CHO.—We to greet thee, etc.

T. B. Wakeman followed:

SPEECH OF THADDEUS B. WAKEMAN.

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: In the unavoidable absence of Mr. James Parton, President of the Liberal Club of this city, it falls to me, its acting Vice-President, to introduce to you, in as few words as I can, the cause that has brought together this magnificent assemblage, and then the man who represents that cause, and whom therefore we are compelled to honor.

The cause, first, because it is for his sacrifices in the great effort that has been made to preserve American liberty from the last great danger to which it has been exposed that we come here to honor a man.

That liberty has been exposed to a danger so insidious, and yet so imminent, that, comparatively speaking, few of the American people have yet become aware of its nature. It is the greatest merit of the man whom I am finally to introduce to you, to say that he among the first saw the cloud in the sky when it was no larger than a hand that portended the storm which now threatens to sweep away the most cherished of American rights and liberties.

Now, that you may have some idea of what this cause is, allow me to suggest concisely a few of the points. I cannot go into them in detail; but, in a word, that danger arises from CALVINISM revived—revived as a method of temporal government and administration. It is an attempt of a few, who imagine that they are the elect of God, to manage and supervise the morals, thoughts, and opinions of the people at large.

The practical result of the efforts of these self-elected pharisees, aristocrats, and priests is simply, if successful, to substitute theocracy and theological vigilance committees in the place of the ordinary common law and administration of the Republic. That effort, unless it is rebuked by the voice of an intelligent people, is the end of American liberty. Let me show you why this is so. It is so because it knocks out the four corner-stones upon which all our liberties were founded and must always rest.

The first corner-stone is the separation of church and state. This Comstock legislation is a direct infringement of that separation. It is a confusion of the temporal and the spiritual powers; it is a grant to an outside committee of the power of making accusations, of setting in action criminal processes, which belong only to the legal administration of justice. It is the attempt of a few to take under their own control the instruments by which ordinary justice is to be meted out to the people. We are no longer equal, no longer citizens of the United States with rights fully equal to others, unless we are responsible, and responsible only, to one and the same tribunal, to an impartial tribunal, to a tribunal which is answerable to the whole people instead of to a church or to a church committee. Our legislatures have of late years borrowed from monarchical governments the fashion of farming out the criminal jurisdiction of the whole people to special theological or amateur societies. Instead of the Grand Jury and District-Attorney of the county, we have a host of Special Agents who administer the power, which the people only possess, to deprive a citizen of liberty, property, character, and even life, by means of a criminal prosecution. This legislation is an exotic of foreign and dangerous origin. All crimes and offenses, and obscenity among them, should certainly be punished, but only by laws and accusations impartially conducted by impartial officers responsible to the Body Politic itself. These societies are formed by impractical sentimentalists who are wholly unfit to be trusted with criminal process in any republic.

The moment the powers of administration of law in a republic pass into theological hands, no matter how or by what name, this government becomes a theocracy. The moment those powers pass out of the people's hands, equality is at an end, liberty is at an end, and the end of the usurpation is simply in the breast of our self-constituted governors. The Church, or Spiritual Power, is only to advise, educate, and consecrate. The State, or Temporal Power, must administer, govern, judge, and execute.

All this legislation, then, whether of the state or national governments, which puts the power of arrest or accusation in the hands of these church vigilance committees or privileged societies—I care not by what name or for what purpose—is anti-republican, undemocratic, and fundamentally wrong in a republic.

Such societies might do in the Old World, whence they are derived or copied, for there they have a nobility, placed by the grace of God, to take care of the common people. It might do there, where they have a state church, anointed from we know not what vast antiquity, with such a care of the lambs of the flock that it takes charge of their lives and means in this world to fit them for the next. But our government is, or at least was intended to be, a government where the power rises up from the people instead of descending from an aristocracy or a priesthood. Now, as these powers spring up from the people, they must be executed impartially by and for the people. Any attempt to frustrate that responsibility and equality under any pretense, good or bad, is the very reversal of the fundamental basis or corner-stone of our government. It is more; it is an insult to every true American citizen—the sublimity of Pharisaical impudence and insolence! No wonder it cuts every freeman to the heart. Therefore, my friends, in regard to this first point, see to it that you become members of the National Liberal League of the United States. That is the only bond, the only society or power, that now exercises any influence to really oppose this aristocracy and semi-theological usurpation by thoroughly effecting the separation of church and state.

Now, for the next point. It is this: This Comstock legislation removes the second corner-stone of American liberty, which is, in in all federal republics, the distinction between the general government and the state governments in the execution of criminal law. This distinction must be preserved, or we shall have an empire or a confused mob. That is a condition of liberty which I have explained in a speech at Faneuil Hall on the occasion of Mr. Heywood's arrest, and which I pray you to obtain from Mr. Bennett and to read. For federal purposes only, a few general duties are submitted to the care of the government; only a few crimes relating to the general purpose are to be punished by it; to the states is left the duty of punishing all offenses or crimes of the people. That general government is practically a foreign government to the people. The judges are appointed for life; the juries are selected in such a way that impartiality is practically impossible. By means of United States Comstock laws the power of punishing offenses is thrown within the criminal jurisdiction of the United States, because the post-office may have been used as the means of committing the offense. By this system the post-office confers criminal jurisdiction. Observe how it works. The pamphlet was in Mr. Bennett's case sent by a citizen to a decoy supposed to reside within the state of New York. What had the general government to do with that? Why could not the state of New York punish Mr. Bennett?

Over in Greenpoint we have lately had the United States government inquiring for weeks about the sending of letters from one citizen to his neighbor, when jurisdiction of the matter should have belonged to the police officer or justice of the peace in that county.

I cannot follow the argument further now, for there is not time; but it is a fundamental one in the great struggle for the preservation of American liberty; for if we let that pass from us, what happens? The United States mail becomes merely a trap for those societies which are organized for the purpose of supervising the opinions of the people. The inviolability of the mail becomes impossible, and there is no liberty in a republic where there is no confidence in her post-offices.

Yes, by decoy, by an espionage, by a supervision of the post-offices, which are now the necessity of every person in the United States, every thought even is put under the criminal jurisdiction of the United States, just contrary to the purpose and intent of the Constitution. Now this removes the third corner-stone of the Republic, which is the freedom of the press. For the consequence is that we have established a censorship of the press. This legislation, by its espionage, places the press in a position that it did not hold under the common law. Under the common law, those who published public documents and distributed them were at liberty to do so if they answered to the common jury of the country for the abuse of that privilege. Now that is all that the Liberals, all that Mr. Bennett, asks leave to do. He don't want to face a censorship in the dark; he don't want to face an inquisition held in a back parlor, composed of men selected for their hostility to his opinions, and who may issue an order for the shutting up of his business and the ruin of himself and family. In other words, at common law there is no censorship prior to publication allowable. Under this law the fact that the postmaster, or the agents of these societies, can inspect and stop matter sent through the mail, prevents the publication of that matter, and is a prior censorship in direct conflict with our common-law rights. Such supervision thoroughly subverts this third corner-stone of American liberty, for if the Press is muzzled or terrorized, if the liberty of publication is suspended by a prior censorship, the public opinion is shackled, and the means of obtaining that justice, knowledge, and information upon which liberty and progress rest becomes impossible.

Now there is one more—the fourth—corner-stone that this legislation sweeps out, and that is, all effective trial by jury. The jury system is hostile to theological inquisition, unless it is practically nullified by the judges. It is not a part of the old Roman civil law. It is a part of the birthright that has come down to us from antiquity through the Anglo-Saxon race; and unless it is preserved, there is no such thing as popular government. Now this legislation places, in the stead of the jury, a censorship, unknown to us, and contrary to our common law. When their decrees have been practically executed, then the matter is submitted formally to a jury, generally of the United States Court, as was the case of our friend Bennett. What is the result? Why, it so happens that in that great conflict for human liberty which was waged against the Stuarts in England, some centuries ago, the common law was overborne and perverted by the dicta of the judges appointed by the Stuarts, and those dicta have been inherited by our judges here. Those definitions made by false and wicked judges under the Stuarts are stated to be present law and still applicable in the trial of American citizens, especially in the United States courts. The real truth is that all questions as to how the guilt is to be measured is taken from the jury by the judge, in making the definition of the crime; the judge decides what the crime is, and the jury have nothing to do except to render the verdict that he dictates. Trial by jury under this legislation, under the laws that have been passed by Congress, is nothing but a farce, and never can be anything more, because the jury have been deprived by the old judges of the right to find upon the law and the facts in cases of obscene libel. The jury do not determine the crime; indeed they have no means of ascertaining it. All evidence by experts, by comparison with other literature, and all means that could render a jury competent are taken away from them by the judge, and he lays before them the definition which covers the case, and compels them to render a verdict; and if they do not render it, he locks them up two or three days till they are forced to give a verdict to fit his definition and desires. That is the way these infamous verdicts have been wrung from juries, the jurors often protesting that they were forced to give a verdict against their consciences and against right, but having no other alternative. Now that jury system, as Blackstone says in his splendid eulogy on the jury, which all of you should be familiar with, is the fundamental principle and corner-stone of our liberties; but it is so only in so far as jurors are allowed the means to make them free, intelligent, and impartial judges of the law and fact in all cases of obscene libels as in other libel cases. In this legislation a theocracy, a privileged tribunal, practically takes its place.

Thus there is no impartial presentation before the grand jury, and there is no such thing as an impartial trial before the petit jury. The whole case is prejudged against you; and, as Comstock said when he went into Judge Benedict's court, "I never fail here!" And he never can fail there with the rulings and definitions which there prevail under this legislation, which violates law by the forms of law.

Now, having merely shown you these four corner-stones and thedangers involved, which you must study out at your leisure, I will refer you to one thing more, if possible more important. This legislation can be effective only by decoy and falsehood.

The very foundation of every republican institution is swept away by the consecration of lying. This theocracy, true to its origin and true to the spirit of its whole history, is breaking up the very life of our republic by introducing lies and falsehood as the basis of public morality and law.

I have never felt more humiliated in my life than when the Chancellor and President of the principal university in this city stood in the hall of the young Christians and pronounced a eulogy upon lying as a method of government. He may have some apology for it, perhaps, in some words, said to be mistakes of St. Paul. I hope they were mistakes, for that apostle did use some other words which were not mistaken, and which, I think, were inspired as much as any words can be, and that was, when he denounced those who "do evil that good may come, whose damnation is just!"

He who advocates falsehood and deceit as a method of government undermines all of the corner-stones of government and of public morality; he dissolves the feeling of trust between citizen and citizens; he makes enemies of the one class as against the other. He makes us all appeal to craft instead of to honor and good faith; he inaugurates anarchy! The moment that is done by those who teach morality, who have special legislation placed in their hands beyond the common law—the moment that is done and is believed to prevail, then every man goes for himself, public confidence in the law is gone. The informer who lies for his God will lie for himself. Every man then throws overboard his sense of justice, and must trust to his own skill, craft, and duplicity for his own safety.

There is no republic possible without truth as its fundamental law and sentiment. The theology that degrades itself by such declarations is damned. We all know that there is no getting to any heaven unless we know enough to stop lying.

Now all the way through the past time, church theocracy, in all its forms of government, has always relied upon falsehood; you know it too well. These Calvinists are merely the Protestant Jesuits, and use the means of the Jesuits and the Inquisitors. They had exquisite methods of torture, but the cruelest, meanest, worst of them all was the torture of the lie.

My friends, this fundamental ground upon which public morals and faith rests can only be preserved by sustaining the regular legal proceedings under the Constitution of the United States and the regular common law of the states for punishment of crimes and abuses. We must adhere to those procedures, and remember that he who first steps outside of them, whether he is an "unco guid" or whether he is a rebel, whether he is Howard Crosby or whether he is Denis Kearney, the first man who steps outside of truth and the law and the forms of the law, and appeals to something that is not law, but which is practically a vigilance committee or mob, that man unchains the tiger. That man makes a precedent which will sweep him away when the tide turns. Only in obedience to the form, to the spirit, and to the purposes of the Constitution and the common law of this country can our liberties be maintained. No gods or lies can save us when the storms of interest or passion are aroused.

So much I have said for the cause. Study it, I pray you, at your leisure. Never in the history of American institutions has so insidious a danger crept upon us; never on that requires more patience to understand. "Eternal vigilance, the price of liberty," should be the watchword you carry with you from this hall to-night.

Now as to THE MAN. He who first took this fight up was the author of this little pamphlet in question, about which I care nothing. But he stood his martyrdom in Massachusetts, and I remember going down to old Faneuil Hall upon his going to prison, before an audience which was but a repetition of this. Then the contest passed on to New York, and the people did not understand it; they do not begin yet to scarcely apprehend it, and our friend D. M. Bennett said—just let me read a few words he used before and after his arrest: "Let me say on this point that my only object in selling this pamphlet is to vindicate the liberty of thought, of the press, and of the mails. I have always announced that I did not approve of it, but as long as Mr. Heywood does, I declare that he has a right to mail it as part of his right to publish it and as a necessary part of the freedom of the press." And then he added, "If this means that I am to go to prison, to prison let it be."

Now that is a touch of vicarious sacrifice, and it is such a touch that I have always felt it to my heart. And this man may do, I hardly care what, but any one who will stand forth to vindicate the liberties of others and take the burden upon himself may do very much before he forfeits my respect and admiration. I know that after his enemies had apparently accomplished their object, and thought that they had gained a victory because they had him incarcerated in their dungeon, they resorted to "exposures" to crush his paper and his friends; to pour obloquy upon everything connected with him and his, and the hour was dark. But, my friends, that true light and fire of sacrifice has illuminated it all, burned out all the dross, and your presence here to-night sweeps away those charges as though they were chaff before the wind. Traitors to liberty, to truth, and the republic, cannot escape by trumpeting the faults of those who suffer for us.

I do not know as all the saints were perfect. I do not know that we shall find a perfect martyr now that they are becoming so few. My friend may have one fault. Even the Rev. Mr. Stiggins was said to have his weakness, and it was whisky punch. My distinguished friend has his weakness, and it is letter-writing. The story is short.

The vigor of life spent among the Shakers, a sudden temptation, but then, like Joseph, he flees away, but unfortunately, instead of leaving his garment, he left his letters behind. And those letters, Mrs. Potiphar, instead of destroying by putting them in the stove or returning them to the writer, after trying to raise money upon them, goes and sells for thirty pieces to his enemy, and his enemy taketh them to Mrs. Pharaoh, and Mrs. Pharaoh takes them to her husband who was the lord of all the dungeons in the land. And the pardon which had been made for Joseph was recalled and he was punished, not for his crime, but for his letter-writing. That part of his sentence I hardly know that I could complain of, for I never have any partiality for long letter writers. But one thing is certain, his Liberal friends are the only ones that ought to complain—or can justly complain. For would any clergyman thus have fled away? Are the clergy such that they can throw stones at him? No, my friends. Let them take the beams out of their own eyes and be silent ever more

The verdict on that subject has been rendered by those concerned, in the words of Robert Burns in his advice to his young friend, in a verse not generally put into his works, but which ought to be. He says, or sings:

"If ye hae made astep aside
Some hap mistake o'erta'en thee.
Yet still keep up a decent pride,
And ne'er o'ermuch demean thee.
Time comes wi' kind oblivious shade
And daily darker hides it,
And if nae mair mistakes are made,
The world soon forgives, forgets it."

So they will decide. For we are to measure human character not by its trivial incidents or faults but by the whole voyage of life. And he who goes around the world will stand as the one who has been truly tried instead of the one who has simply been to the Narrows and Sandy Hook. And so with our friend. He has borne the brunt of the battle not for his own gain but to awaken the American people to the great cause and interests at stake, and which are really their own interests. He has done this at a time when there were few or none to take that position. He has borne his sacrifice patiently and well, and it is an honor to ourselves that we come here to honor him. We do not indorse nor honor his faults but his virtues and his good works, which far overbalance them. Nor do we indorse the faults of those who sustain the cause of liberty, and have done so throughout the past. We must not wait for it to be sustained by saints alone. It is a shame for those who complain of the faults of those who advocate liberty that they stand aside and leave liberty no other defenders. I would indeed like to have so-called respectable people as fellow-soldiers in this contest for the preservation of our liberties; but when I call the roll, I find them slinking back to the enemy under the first fire of obliquy. Blessed, then, be the "Publicans and sinners" who take their places! Should the ideal Christ return, where would he find his friends? I think he would find them where he found them of old.

I had hoped to present our friend to you in his prison garb, but it so happens that Uncle Sam has so many applicants just now for those garments that one could not be obtained for love or money, and I shall have to present him without martyr uniform and in plain citizen's dress, and in that dress I confess I like him best.

The kind-hearted gentleman, the real "truth seeker," the faithful friend and citizen, let us honor him with our sympathy for the past, and with our support in the future. Let him know that he who steps forward to vindicate our rights will find us in close rank to sustain and defend him, and able to see that his sacrifice shall not fail but shall become indeed the earnest of a victory for our whole country. So, my friends, let me in behalf of you all extend to our friend upon his return to civil life the right hand of friendship.

Here the speaker grasped Mr. Bennett's hand and lead him to the front of the platform.

During Mr. Wakeman's address the applause was most abundant, and when he advanced with Mr. Bennett, the applause and cheers of the audience were immense and long continued. Handkerchiefs were waved, hats and canes were swayed vigorously, stamping, shouting, cheering, and other emphatic forms of welcome and gladness were employed. Many rose in their seas and shouted at the top of their voices. This continued several minutes. A gentleman in the gallery arose in his place and proposed three rousing cheers for Mr. Bennett, which were given with a hearty good will. A large and beautiful bouquet was handed up to him from a lady in the audience for which he expressed thanks in a bow of gratitude. As soon as quiet was restored, Mr. Bennett made the following remarks, but at first partially overcome by the emotions of gratitude for the kindness of his many friends, which welled up in his heart.

SPEECH OF D. M. BENNETT.

MY DEAR FRIENDS: Language is feeble to express to you the sentiment of my heart at this moment. I feel grateful to you for your kindness, for your sympathy, and for your appreciation of the feeble efforts I have made in behalf of liberty.

I can well say this is the happiest moment of my life [applause]. I feel repaid, almost now, for what I endured in the lonely cell, four feet by eight, as well as when I lay upon the sick-bed in the hospital of the prison. I feel glad and thankful to unite with you in defense of the rights of American citizens, of liberty of speech, the liberty of the press, the freedom of the mails.

I shall not, so long as I have breath and strength, be false to these grand principles of American liberty [applause].

I do not want to do anything that is a violation of justice and right, but if it is necessary in the vindication of what I believe to be right to again enter the prison cell—although I am in somewhat advanced years—I will do it. I will not be a coward to what I know is right. I will not be false to the principles of liberty, truth, and justice so long as I know myself and have my right mind [applause].

I feel that though this is called the greatest and freest government in the world, there are certain things to be viewed with apprehension and fear. This government was founded by such great men as Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Thomas Paine [great applause]. Our liberties were fought for by our grandfathers, men of sterling integrity, lovers of freedom, and when the government was established, and our Constitution was formed, there was no room for ecclesiastical tyranny [applause]; there was no provision made in the foundation of this government for one man to be the victim of another because he differed in religious views, because he was not a believer in certain religious theories, certain creeds. But it was as free—designedly so—for a Mohammedan, for a Buddhist, for a Confucian, for a Christian, or for a unbeliever in one god, or in all gods, as it was for the most pious and devout believer in the Christian religion [applause].

Among the first acts of this government was a treaty formed with the government of Tripoli, which you all know has a Mohammedan government. And at that time when George Washington was President of this country it was decisively announced, openly and bravely too, that this was not a Christian government. It did not recognize any system of religion one above the other [applause], but it was as free for one as another.

In view of this I say it is saddening to see that we are deteriorating. We may be gaining in some directions in the line of free thought and general liberty. Liberalism may be on the increase, and I know it is; but still the power of the church seems to be intensifying; it seems to be gaining ground.

It is a new thing for a man to be imprisoned here for opinion's sake. It is a new thing for a person to be arraigned before the courts of the United States because his religious views do not correspond with the majority or with those who have the control of the government. It is a new thing for a man to be sent to prison upon a mere pretext. I was. I was tried, ostensibly, upon the charge of mailing obscene literature. The book is not obscene! Attorney-General Devens, Secretaries Sherman, Schurz, Pardon Clerk Judge Gray, and many others connected with the government, have read it with care, and none of them thought it was obscene. They perhaps did not approve of the argument or the theory of the pamphlet, but it was not an obscene work. President Hayes said I had committed no crime, and that I did not deserve imprisonment. But still President Hayes, in spite of this, disregarded the voice of justice and mercy and listened to the commands of the church and kept me in prison, though at the time my health was seriously failing, and grave apprehensions were entertained as to my life. It was the first time in the history of our country, and perhaps in the world, that a petition bearing two hundred thousand names asked for the pardon of an unjustly imprisoned individual. It is the first time ten thousand letters were written asking for the same act of justice. It is the first time that the Christian church of this country, by concerted action, attempted to influence the President against an unbeliever. It is the first time that the President of the United States disregarded the prayer of such an immense number of earnest, good people to perform a simple, honest, good deed, giving the preference to the devotees of bigotry, intolerance, and superstition. It is the first time the government has bowed itself in submission to the commands of sectarian persecuting religionists. I was tried here in his city before Judge Charles L. Benedict, before a Christian jury, prosecuted by a Christian district attorney. I was convicted solely because I was editor and publisher of the paper called THE TRUTH SEEKER, and because of the little pamphlet I once wrote, entitled "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ" [Applause.] These were held up before the jury, and the district-attorney says, "This is the paper he publishes, and it is read weekly by fifty thousand people;" and the "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," a little pamphlet of thirty-two pages, was also held up to the jury, at which they were horror-struck. Joseph Cook, the great so-considered scientific and ecclesiastical speaker, was there and lent his presence to help Comstock overawe the jury that they might convict me. He read the "Open Letter" in the presence of the jury, and it was on this I was convicted more than Mr. Heywood's pamphlet on the marriage question. That was only a pretext. Let it be forever remembered that within twenty-one years of the end of the nineteenth century an old man was sent to prison on a false pretext.

Let it also be remembered that one of the first clergymen in this city, the Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., L.L.D., Chancellor of the New York University, declared in his speech in a public meeting in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association that the sending of me to prison was the greatest thing that had ever been performed. It was worth, he said, a hundred thousand times what had been paid into Comstock's obscene society (the Society for the Suppression of Vice). Well, when I got that report in my prison—for I was allowed to see sometimes a little bit of news from the outside world—as I had not much to do, I calculated how much good I was doing. I never dreamed I could do so much good in any condition I could be placed in. A hundred thousand times fifty thousand dollars—for that is the amount that has been paid into that society—makes the snug sum of five billion dollars. That is about equal to the national debt of both Great Britain and America. Well, to earn that much in a year astonished me excessively. I found that I was making fifteen million dollars a day for the Christians in this country [laughter]. Take the days that I was confined there, it would make fifteen million dollars a day, or a million and a half dollars per hour, of ten hours a day. That is according to the Rev. Howard Crosby. And he thought it was a glorious thing to send me to prison. It may be it will prove so. It may be that they will ever rejoice that they sent an old man to prison for mailing a philosophical semi-physiological pamphlet upon the question of marriage and the relation of the sexes, in which there is not one obscene word, not one obscene thought, not one obscene argument, but simply plain and fair language, that every man and woman ought to be able to read without the slightest detriment.

There were thousands of those pamphlets sold before I went to prison. Thousands have been sold since. Hundreds of thousands of people of America have read that pamphlet of twenty-three pages. I do not believe that one person, old or young, has ever been injured one particle by it [applause]. But I was sent to prison because certain detached passages were presented to the jury without reading it all, and because Judge Benedict said if they saw *any*thing that had any tendency of any kind to produce any unpleasant effects upon *any*body—if, IF—I should be found guilty. It was a foregone conclusion that I should be convicted. It was all "cut and dried" before I was brought into that court that I should be convicted, but what could I expect? I am an Infidel. I don't believe as much as they say I ought to, but I believe all I can.

The foreman of the jury was a superintendent of a Sabbath-school. A pretty nice man, perhaps, but his views are not very broad. Thoroughly opposed to me in religious views, I was regarded by that Christian jury as a very bad man. It may be I am; but I never killed anybody, never robbed a bank, never committed burglary, nor any other kind of robbery, but I was convicted easily. I do not know but I could tell you something about prison life, but I must not detain you, though I have experienced a little of it. I will just say this, Our prisons are terrible places. They are the most unhappy of places for a man to be placed in.

I am satisfied that in what are called our courts of justice there is far more injustice than justice. I became acquainted with men, when I was in prison up there, sentenced for life who I am fully convinced were not guilty. I saw two men sent there for life for murder. I do not believe, after thoroughly looking into the cases, that either of them was guilty in the slightest degree. A poor man without friends, without money, stands a very slim chance of getting justice in our courts; whereas, a rich man, with rich, influential friends can do almost anything and yet escape punishment. The discipline in the prison where I was is severe. I got acquainted with men who have been in Auburn, Sing Sing, Clinton prison, and in prisons in other states. I was thrown among rather a hard class, I admit, but I made the best of it. In the workshop where I was employed two months at shoemaking, there we had to stand all day, and it was very hard. We could not speak, nor could we even raise our eyes. We had to be very precise as to many things or we would be taken to the dungeon, or the "paddle," as they call that mode of punishment. After I had been there some time I became ill and was removed to the hospital. During my confinement I conversed considerably with men of all shades of crime—thieves, pickpockets, burglars, murderers, those who had committed rape, arson, etc., and I had a pretty good chance to compare myself with men who were guilty of all sorts of crimes; and I learned from several men that the rules of this prison were considered more severe, more irksome than those of any other prison they had been in. I heard many men say that. The food is of a quality illy calculated to feed men who have to do hard labor. They feed the men as cheaply as they can. The penitentiary belongs to Albany county. The object, of course, is to make as much as possible for the county. It has made $25,000 to $40,000 per year above all expenses, after paying the superintendent, deputy-superintendent, and all the officials, though there are twenty or thirty of them, which makes a very handsome thing for the county, even though the poor prisoners are half fed. I think it would be far better to make $15,000 less a year, and give the men who have to labor food they can eat without gagging, and which would enable them to work.

I have words of praise to speak for some who are connected with the establishment. Superintendent McEwen is a gentleman. There are, of course, rules which he has to be governed by, but he is a kind-hearted man, and his family did as much as they could for me. I had some favors shown me while I was sick, which I cannot forget. I want to speak in gratitude of them, and assure them I appreciate their kindness. They were not cruel to me. The officers treated me quite kindly. At first they were very harsh. They spoke to me as if I was a dog. They spoke to me with such severity that it made me feel badly. I must say it was an unpleasant experience. But after we got acquainted they treated me better. I will not say they used me amiss. Now, I will not detain you longer. There are plenty of others to speak, and I would much prefer to listen to them. I thank you heartily for your kindness. I am resolved to be a good citizen. I have endeavored heretofore to be so. I shall continue to be a law-abiding citizen, but I will speak in defense of liberty. I will speak in defense of that which I think is right. I will speak the truth, and I will print it. [Applause].

AMELIA H. COLBY.

Mr. Bennett, Mr. Chairman, and Women and Men: The occasion which brings us together this evening is one which brings to me a large amount of sadness. While I look at these men and giant minds of the age of to-day, and while I listen to the sayings that have already been spoken by these men of thought and men of grand caliber and mentalities, I ask you the question, have they told the truth?

Is it true that D. M. Bennett, in this great Empire state of New York, and while the nineteenth century was robing itself with a mantle of almost a hundred years, has been falsely imprisoned? Is it true that the man who lived a hundred years ago and wrote the "Age of Reason" [applause], for which he was imprisoned, and a man who lives to-day by the name of D. M. Bennett, and who has forced a large class of the religious world to utilize and to apply the "Age of Reason," written by Thomas Paine? [Applause.] I say, is it true that a hundred years after a man must be imprisoned in this great and grand civilization of America? And for what? Why, my friends, I know of no way of removing evils but to understand the cause that produces them. And right here let me say I don't wish to take any note of time; hence you will please time me, for if I should get wound up, why, it would take me a long time to run down.

I remember reading, and so do many of you, the words that were given many years ago, and they are these: "All men are born free and equal." Was that a fact a hundred years ago? I remember well the sensation that vibrated through the patriotic souls that were then in the Colonies, which are now your United States. I remember well the shaking of monarchical powers; I remember well the trembling of priesthood from center to circumference as the cry went forth that all men were born free and equal. I ask you, if it was true a hundred years ago, what has changed its truth from that day till now? If it is true now, is Mr. Bennett born with the same privileges, with the same rights, with the same equality, that President Hayes has? Is he born with the same rights of Anthony Comstock? Is he born with the same rights as juries, judges, lawyers, doctors, priests, popes, clergymen, and ministers? If he is, why is he falsely imprisoned?

My friends, you have arrived at a point in United States' history when it demands investigation; and instead you find men and women using six days out of every seven in trying to find out how you can adorn your persons to make yourselves appear the most lovely to one of the sixty thousand ministers in the United States. [Applause.] Why, it seems to me you had better be educating yourselves upon the statutes of your state and upon the government of your nation and knowing where you are drifting. If man can help pay the church salary; if he can support the ministers; if his wife, or daughter, or sister can dress well enough to appear in some of your high churches, it is no matter about constitutions; it is no matter about poor unfortunate men that are born here. To investigate truth, they must do as martyrs in the ages of the past, and be glad to do it. Who objects? Who denounces Mr. Bennett? Who denounces Mr. Heywood? Who denounces John A. Lant? Who denounces these men? Not Infidels; not scientific men. Who then? The priests and their parrots. [Applause.] Volney says, "Educate the people and all is lost." The priesthood know to-day if you take men and women, if you allow them to know and understand the necessities, the demands, of their life, that their power is eventually lost; and, rather than to have their power lost, they would damn a world to save themselves. [Applause.]

The Constitution of the United States passed on seventy years almost before the church found out that it had no God; and, had our Infidel minds kept still, they would not have known it till to-day. And why? Because they are not investigative minds; and now their cry is, "Let us have God in the Constitution!"

I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman; I want to say to every gray-haired man and woman; mother and father; to every son and daughter, that when that question is asked, why there is no God in the Constitution of the United States, or when the demand is made that that God shall be changed, you are standing upon the brink of a political abyss, of a national revolution, that nothing can save you from unless you educate yourselves, or unless you use the sword and the bullet as in days gone by. [Applause.]

No God in the Constitution of the United States! What was it that lifted the foot of slavery from off three hundred thousand square miles of slave territory and gave it to the freeman's tread? What was it that hushed in silence for ever the cries of the poor unfortunate slaves that toiled incessantly beneath the power of the slaveholder in the Southern rice swamps and cotton fields, and that destroyed for all time the last slave mart in the United States? and no God in the Constitution! What was it that made every male slave a citizen and placed him side by side with the Anglo-Saxon? What was it, I ask you, and no God?

This is an hour and a time when the demand is that every man and woman, whether in the church or outside of it, investigate the condition of this nation. You have just passed through a political war. Hear me for a moment, while I review its causes and results, saying nothing about the millions and millions of dollars of indebtedness that has fallen upon the shoulders of this people, so that to-day, instead of four million slaves you have thirty millions, and instead of being black they are of the Anglo-Saxon race. But, my friends, not one mother that lost one of her boys, who were made martyrs to your late civil and political war' felt the money that it cost you; not one; but how many left their homes and returned no more forever? More than three hundred thousand young men left their homes and returned no more forever. Their blood stained the summits of your mountains and the green pastures of your valleys. Their bones lie bleaching under the rays of a Southern sun. All over this vast continent of yours, between rivers and oceans, the cry went forth, and Liberty was the watchword and freedom the giant power that marched these bold and brave young men to fight the battles for your liberty and the liberty of your children and your children's children. More than twice that number of older men bared their bosoms to the mouth of the booming cannon and fought as no man ever fought before. And why and what for? Was it so that a priestly power sixty thousand strong should say to the American people what they should send through the United States mail and what they should not? I answer No. [Applause.] But that America's freedom should be protected; that every child belonging to her soil, that every person that came and supped with us beneath our sunshine, that every human being that came to our shores, whether begotten in America or upon the shores of the Old World, should have equal privileges, rights, and liberties throughout every condition belonging to the government of the United States and to the statutes of your states. Are these of a necessity? Are these things facts? Is it a fact that a man has been imprisoned unjustly? Is it a fact that two men, hundreds of men, have been defrauded of their property? Their good names have been destroyed under these rules of tyranny that the power of the church has been wielding ever since you and I have had any history of her existence. Whenever you put God into your Constitution you put every American citizen out. [Applause.]

SPEECH OF JAMES D. M'CLELLAN.

MR. CHAIRMAN, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: I had no conception this evening when I availed myself of the invitation which had been extended to me by the Committee which has charge of this meeting, that one so intelligent, so respectable and enthusiastic, would be within the four walls of this building. I came here, Mr. Chairman, as a sympathizer with the cause which the martyrdom of Mr. Bennett represents, and I was again convinced that in the history of the American people the cause of civil and religious liberty cannot be stopped by an incident like the martyrdom of a citizen [Applause.] I have watched, sir, for many years the progress of this intolerant, this narrow legislation that has been put upon the statute books of our country. I have, sir, in the courts, upon more than one occasion, had great cause in speaking to juries to ask them to consider whether they should in an age like this consign men to the prison upon evidence which was not evidence before this legislation came into existence. [Applause.] I know, ladies and gentlemen, that you, reading as you do in the public papers, going as you do into your public meeting, have no opportunity of witnessing the workings of the laws as they are applied in the United States District Court of this district, and in other United States district courts throughout the length and breadth of this country. For I tell you to-night, and Mr. Bennett and those other gentlemen that are here upon this platform and are in the audience will bear me out, that liberty is outraged, that tyranny is triumphant, and American history is disgraced. [Applause.] I have thought, sir, from the earliest days when I commenced to read the law of this land that one of the great principles of legislation was to make no act a crime unless that act was prompted by a wicked and criminal intent. I pick up the history of our legislation for the last fifteen years in the halls of our national Congress, and what do we find—in a land that boasts, sir, of religious and civil liberty—what do I find? That a gentleman as respectable as this gentleman can have his liberties taken from him by a man like Anthony Comstock, who has become a moral leper of our country; a man—God forbid that I should even misname him. I say a man that, if there is any truth in the law of condemnation, as is believed by the Christian dispensation, willd find no hell too hot, no pit too deep, in which to put him. I perceive, ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, that recently Mr. Comstock has been perusing the pages of Roscoe's "Criminal Evidence" and "Phillips upon Evidence," and at a congratulatory meeting of a number of fighting Methodist clergymen—I don't want to say anything against clergymen, for I have found them very acceptable acquaintances and friends—but I perceive that at a meeting—a Methodist conference—Mr. Comstock has been perusing Roscoe's "Criminal Evidence," and that he found upon the pages of that celebrated and eminent work some justification for the procedure which he had been following up for the last twelve or fifteen years; and our friends in the conference became so completely satisfied with the conviction upon the authority which he there cited that they unanimously voted him confidence and a godspeed him in his good work.

While I read that I thought of Anthony Comstock. You, my friends, have not seen him as Mr. Bennett has seen him. You have not seen him as the poor, unhappy, unfortunate man sitting at the bar to be tried has seen him. I have seen him go to the District Court in this U. S. District, and take the "sacred scriptures" in his hand, and, under the one-sided ruling of Judge Benedict, swear into prison and doom to solitary confinement as noble men and as true as ever lifted their eyes in supplication for mercy. I knew a young and gallant soldier, who fought bravely for his country while Comstock was serving God in the rear. I defended that man before what I call a journeyman jury; and I am not saying this harshly nor unkindly, for I say if there is a blot upon the administration of our criminal laws in the United States to-day it is the jury system as it exists in the United States district courts. I saw that young, gallant soldier, honorably discharged from the army, having left upon the field of battle won his good right arm; and as he came into that court nobly and truthfully to answer a charge that Mr. Comstock had inveigled him into a correspondence, and his young and beautiful wife and his three handsome children sitting beside him, it did seem as though God inspired us all that day, for we found some good Samaritan upon the jury. And while those children cried and clamored around their father's knee, speaking to him who was soon, as they supposed, to go to prison, I saw that Anthony Comstock sit as stolid as a stoic, with no sign of sympathy, no throb of compassion, cold and heartless. There was the husband and the father; there was the wife and the mother; and then my thoughts turned to the hour of pious devotion and meditation, when Anthony Comstock, in company with his Methodistical friends and his orthodox brethren, dropped upon his knees and repeated that good and beautiful prayer, "Lead us not into temptation." [Applause.] And then, again, as I allowed my imagination to picture out the scene of his orthodox devotion, I thought I could hear him singing the old refrain:

"Teach me to feel another's woe.
To hide the faults I see;
The mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me."

But there are plenty of others who are here to address you. There is much to be said upon this subject, and I cannot trespass upon your patience and intelligence longer, but will say to you that you have commenced the work of reform here to-night. You have commenced the great crusade which will end in the extirpation of such men as Comstock and his hirelings, and you will continue in this work until the historians shall record in the annals of our country that a monstrosity like Comstock is an impossibility in the legal history of our country [applause]; and you in your individual capacity can go out to-night and from this time forward create a healthy public sentiment that will accomplish that result. There is an incident in the history of England, and a motto which was displayed upon one occasion by the great Admiral Nelson. When the French fleet was seen in the distance it was thought that the English government was at an end, that the proud and boasted Britannia would not rule the wave any longer. Just as that battle opened, from the Admiral's ship, from the foremost mast, was thrown out the pennant, and upon it was this motto, "This day England expects every man to do his duty." So to-night have we thrown out to the breeze the great banner, and upon it is inscribed, "America expects every son and daughter to do their duty."

The following resolutions were read by Dr. T. L. Brown and supported by Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews in the subjoined speech, after which they were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That in the assault upon D. M. Bennett the liberties of every citizen of the land have been assailed.

2. Resolved, That we do hereby protest against the corruption in office, the hypocrisy in the pulpit, and the dishonesty on the bench, which have combined to perpetrate this outrage upon Mr. Bennett.

3. Resolved, That in D. M. Bennett we recognize that highest and noblest type of a true citizen—a PATRIOT; for while the loyal obey, the patient endure, and tyrants execute bad laws, none but the patriot risks life and liberty to defy and break them. It was his defiance of unjust laws that made Washington a traitor to his king and government and gave us liberty.

4. Resolved, That the principle of freedom is never so adequately and absolutely vindicated as when it is rigorously applied in a sense running counter to our own prejudices; as in a case, for example, where we do not sympathize with the act done, and where, even, we strenuously disapprove of it; but when we intelligently and firmly stand for the equal rights of all others to judge for themselves, and for their civil right to do precisely that which we most vehemently disapprove and condemn—short of actual and obvious encroachment; that this idea of freedom for what we cannot approve, because we approve of freedom, is Americanism pure and simple, and the most difficult lesson which the devotees of arbitrary authority, ecclesiastical, political, or social, have ever to learn; but one which must be learned, and laboriously inculcated at all hazards.

5. Resolved, That any other doctrine than this incurs the necessity, and entails the curse on our people of a censorship of the press; of an organized and perpetual body of government spies, and of the whole machinery of religious, political, and social repression which we in the past have been happily rid of; and the reintroduction of which will be the rapid and complete subversion of the most advanced and benign system of institutions which the world has ever seen; and with the continuance of which the well-being of humanity is most closely united.

6. Resolved, That we deliberately denounce the Comstock legislation, as to its hidden and real animus, which is the suppression of free thought and the freedom of the press; and the rulings of Judge Benedict in the case of Bennett; and the refusal of President Hayes to interfere, as a legislative, a judicial, and administrative outrage; and that we pledge ourselves to continue to do whatsoever true men and true women may rightly do to reverse this whole current of procedure,

7. Resolved, That if it were not too melancholy and dangerous it would be comically ludicrous to behold the gigantic machinery of the United States government invoked to punish by ten years' imprisonment, and five thousand dollars fine, some thoughtless or angry boy or man who has said a naughty word, on paper, through the post office to some one who to protect himself has only to decline to read what is sent him, or throw it into the waste basket; and that this great country is now afflicted and disgraced, through the activity of a few over-zealous bigots, by a new edition of the Connecticut Blue laws, so ridiculous that the people almost refuse as yet to believe in their existence.

8. Resolved, That amending "God" into the Constitution openly urged, and the Comstock law secretly enacted, originate in one and the same source, and are parts of one and the same policy of the ecclesiastical party, namely, to re-establish the union of church and state and to regain the priestly power so vigorously denounced by the fathers of the revolution and so determinedly rejected by the framers of the Constitution.

9. Resolved, That though, religiously, Anthony Comstock is the creature of the church, politically he is the product of the Republican party, and that his law is the work of a Republican Congress; and that as the "God-in-the-Constitution" proposition came within two votes of receiving a two-thirds majority of the Senate in a late Congress (1876), twenty-eight votes, all Republican, being cast for it, and sixteen, all Democratic, against it, these measures and this action of the respective parties should be taken into careful consideration by every voting Liberal, and unless the party dismiss Comstock.

10. Resolved, That all other questions now agitated by the great political parties are not worth a moment's consideration in comparison with the new questions of human freedom lately and so suddenly sprung upon the people, and that all other questions should be adjourned till this one of freedom of the press and personal liberty be fought out over again, and finally settled so that it will stay settled.

11 Resolved, Therefore, if as most of the enemies of Liberalism, and even some of its friends have averred, "Cupid's Yokes" were a weak literary production and of a bad moral tendency (in our judgment), and if as the same or other persons have affirmed, D. M. Bennett were an uncultured, uncouth, immoral, and wicked individual, wantonly blaspheming the sanctities of other people, and abounding in bald, bold, and shocking utterances, offending the good taste of both friends and foes, that these facts would furnish us our supreme opportunity for vindicating the principle of freedom; of others' freedom along with, and as equal to our own; that those facts if they were openly conceded as true (a question of critical acumen which is not here involved), so far from weakening our position would vastly strengthen it, and would constitute the special occasion, and the higher demand on all true Liberals to plant themselves unflinchingly on the equal rights of E. H. Heywood and D. M. Bennett with all others, precisely as if they were the most "pious," the most "moral," and most "highly cultured" of individuals.

12. Resolved, That American institutions are the one grand experiment in the world, based on a sublime faith in the self-regulating potencies of freedom; on the exalted doctrine that the cure for the evils of freedom is more freedom; and that the so-called Comstock legislation is an insidious and specious attempt—under the pretext of regulating a trivial and comparatively unimportant matter—to circumvent, reverse, and defeat the legitimate operation of the American type of government and social organization, and to substitute the old, oppressive, and discarded methods of the tyrannies of the past; the constant all-sided, and impertinent interference of the government with the affairs and liberties of the citizen.

13. Resolved, That already under this new and disastrous legislation, of the very existence and of the true nature and extent of which the country at large is as yet wholly unaware, men of science, artists, and philanthropic reformers, publishing their works in utter good faith, are living so far as they have become cognizant of those laws under a veritable reign of terror; and that in so far as they are not informed, they are daily incurring the risk of a savage, terrific, and excessive punishment from the law, for no crime, in ignorance of their danger, and trusting to the spirit of freedom which has hitherto characterized our country and distinguished it from Russia, Turkey, and the despotisms of the past.

MR. STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

Ladies and Gentlemen: I came upon this platform thinking that I was secured by an understanding that I was not to be called on for a speech. But as that understanding has not protected me, and has not and will not protect you, I ask of you a little attention to the remarks that I have to make based on the resolutions to which you have listened.

Let us look a little at the fundamental principles. There are in fact only two methods of government before this entire world. One of these methods has been tried and is tried yet on most of the soils of the different lands upon the face of the earth, while we in America are pledged to the purpose of testing another and a different method of regarding the relations of government to the governed. We here hold that the governors are merely the agents for the execution of the will of the people. We here have a government based on the ideas which are contained in the American Declaration of Independence. We here are working out a great experiment in behalf of human freedom. But we have to be always vigilant. Perpetual vigilance is the price of freedom. We have had already in this country two grand crises in the war which we, as Americans, are instituting against the tyrannies of the past. One of those crises was at the time of the war of the Revolution for the purpose of establishing our political freedom. That war gave the occasion—was the opportunity—for injecting into American institutions such doctrines as we believe in here to-day—such doctrines as had never been made the basis of any government on the face of the earth prior to that time. I believe that the American people, on the occasion of that great revolutionary crisis, adopted and formed doctrines in behalf of freedom for which they themselves were not in any great degree prepared. They had not grown up to the views that were entertained by Thomas Jefferson and Thomas Paine, but the circumstances favored their adoption of those views, their incorporation of them into the Declaration of Independence, and subsequently into the Constitution. The people, therefore, had interpolated a doctrine of human growth and freedom that was entirely in advance of their own growth; it was in advance of any development that had taken place in any large way on the surface of the planet. The result has been that we naturally seem to recede from those principles as we progress. We were led forward in the history of the last hundred years until we came to this second of those grand crises which have marked that history; that was the conflict with American slavery.

It was two or three men who aroused the nation from a state of lethargy, which had acted with torpedo touch upon the minds of the people; and we discovered that so far from practically vindicating the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, we were ourselves driven back into a despotism which was gradually and slowly creeping over the whole country. But Garrison and Phillips, and the few brave men and women who took up that agitation and held it during thirty years, ultimately aroused the conscience and the interest of the people of this country, and we went successfully through that second great American crisis. We abolished slavery. We rendered our institutions harmonious with the doctrines of the American Declaration of Independence and the American Constitution. We, in other words, established, or began anew to establish, the doctrine which may be distinctively called Americanism, which we had but half understood at first, which we hardly understood yet, and which we hardly understand now. [Applause.]

Finally we come here at this time to inaugurate the third grand crisis of this American war in behalf of freedom. [Applause.] We have gone back since the days of the anti-slavery war as we went back naturally and necessarily between the Declaration of Independence and the anti slavery war. When there is not some aggression on hand; when men are not aroused to think; when a new generation of people arise that have not been indoctrinated, we are always to expect that there will be a receding from the advanced position which our highest doctrine announces. We must be on the alert to watch for such conditions as this, and we are now in that condition exactly—that we have become so secure, or felt so secure, in the possession of our freedom, that we did not anticipate that any invasion of it was to come from any source whatever; and the community at large is not as yet aroused to the fact that any such aggression, any such conspiracy against the freedom of the American people, has been devised and partially executed as that which has sent that man to prison to wear prison clothes and to work at hard labor under the severest discipline for one year.

Let me call your attention, gentlemen and ladies, to another man who has suffered from this same conspiracy; another victim to this same false legislation and false execution of the laws of the land. I ask my friend, E. H. Heywood, to present himself to this audience. (Mr. Heywood arose.) That gentleman is the author of this far-famed pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes." (Applause.) That is the man who was convicted under these same Comstock laws in Massachusetts and sent to the state prison there, and was pardoned out after some seven months' imprisonment by President Hayes. (Applause.) Now he was convicted on this foulest of all charges, the charge of obscenity. You are wise men and women. You have seen others and learned to judge by looking in their faces and at their persons. There is not one of you here but what would be ashamed to impute on the mere presence of this learned and excellent man any such thought or purpose as that! (Applause.) Nor did the judge or the jury believe anything of the kind. It is simply a blind infatuation or a timid and cowardly yielding to what is supposed to be public opinion. But audiences like this, taking up this subject and giving their verdict in relation to it, will reverse all that opinion. We have simply to do as we are doing here to-night to give warning to these over-zealous invaders of our rights that the time has come when we shall stand for the principles of American liberty. (Applause.)

I will close my remarks with one word more. I wish to call your attention to a point that has not been mentioned, the utter and savage barbarity and severity of these laws. Suppose there was such an offense as has been indicated here, and a man was sent for sixty days to the Island, wouldn't that be ample? On the contrary, ten years' imprisonment—that is the maximum—and $5,000 fine for sending a foolish thing, perhaps, through the mail.

SPEECH OF LUCY N. COLMAN.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I have the reputation of being a very daring woman, and certainly have proved it by presenting myself before you to-night. I am not learned in the schools; I have neither the profession of priest nor of lawyer. I know nothing comparatively of the law, very little of logic. But I know something of common sense. (A voice: "Hear, hear!") And so please bear with me a very few minutes; for daring as I am I would not be unjust, and certainly I should be unjust to this magnificent audience if I were to take its time while others with so much more ability are behind me ready to speak. But you will be surprised when I say to you, I want to ask the mothers in this audience—now be careful—I want to ask the mothers in this audience what kind of a feeling would come over them—any one of you—were you the mother of Anthony Comstock. [Great applause.] To what depths may a woman sink who dares to take upon her the holy office of motherhood ignorantly and profanely.

Friends, long ago, long ago, when the flush of girlhood was upon my cheeks, I went before audiences, ignorant though I was, to plead for the redemption of the slave. I thought I had earned a right to quiet in my old age with my venerable friend, whom every one of you want to know—Amy Post, of Rochester. [Applause and cries of "Let's see her," whereupon Amy Post stood up.] The very compeers of Lucretia Mott, Amy Post and Lucy N. Colman dared to be called the "queens of obscenity" for liberty and freedom!

Mr. Bennett, if others have suffered for you as I have suffered the past year, they know how to say, All honor, all honor, good and faithful servant (here she shook hands with Mr. Bennett), you have all our hearts.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

The reference to the venerable Lucretia Mott incites me to say that it was my good fortune, when a young man, to be present at the convention in Philadelphia, in 1833, which formed the American Antislavery Society. It was considered dangerous by the authorities for us to meet in the evening. We could meet in a certain small hall, about sixty or seventy of us from all parts of the country; and when we got together we thought it was necessary to have some gentleman of great dignity to preside at our meetings. So we sent a committee for a venerable gentleman who had been an antislavery man from the time of the Revolution—a man of great dignity—but he declined to come, and our men delegates were very much disheartened; a good many of them thought we had better postpone the meeting, when there arose a lady, who said: "Gentlemen, are you afraid to do this thing? Don't you dare to form such a society?" Well, she shamed us out of the idea of going away. I am sorry to say that in the report of that meeting there was no mention made of Lucretia Mott; but it was her speech, which we thought a sort of miraculous thing, that spunked us up to be somebody. Now we people meet together for freedom of the soul as well as of the body, and we fall back upon these mothers in Israel, who set us on; and we rely upon them to carry on this great battle of humanity, for the freedom of the soul. [Applause.]

MR. HEYWOOD'S SPEECH.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen: At this late hour I feel I ought not to take your time, but certainly cannot resist the desire to say how glad I am to be here with you to stand up for free speech with D. M. Bennett; how glad I am that you, sir, the President of the National Liberal League, with its nearly two hundred auxiliaries, running through all the states, that you, sir, come here to add your brave and intelligent voice to this condemnation of the outrage suffered by our friend Mr. Bennett, a man who was sent to the Albany Penitentiary for having done no wrong, a man who never wronged any one, who was sent there for a brave and noble deed, a deed of which any American citizen might well be proud (applause), that of deliberately confronting a wicked and unjust law, and treading it under foot. . . .

You remember, and I will recall this, that Mr. Bennett's selling "Cupid's Yokes," and sending it through the mail, occurred in this way: A sister-in-law, and love, of mine, Josephine Tilton, went to Watkins two years ago last August, in the way of business, to dispose of reform publications. In the course of the convention there, she happening to be away to dinner, Mr. Bennett, as any gentleman would do, and be glad to do, sold some of her pamphlets, dropping the money into her box, simply to assist her. Some spy was on the ground, and he, that afternoon, was arrested, taken over to the village, and held for trial. Soon after, another man, a distinguished friend, the Liberal lecturer William S. Bell, was arrested in the same manner, and held to bail. Later on, the lady herself, Miss Tilton, was arrested, taken over, and held for trial. Still later, a citizen of the place feeling outraged that strangers were treated in that way, attempted to investigate the matter and see if he could not put a stop to it, when, lo, he too was arrested, until four were held for trial—another case waiting over his head. I got the news in my cell, No. 52, Dedham Jail, and Mr. Bennett felt so indignant that American citizens could be treated in that way, that he stated publicly, and printed it in his paper, "I will sell the book to anyone who calls; I will send it by mail;" knowing when he stated it that I was in jail under sentence to two years' imprisonment at hard labor; knowing that he said it at the peril of going behind the bars—I say that act is one which has few parallels for courage, for intelligent bravery, in the annals of this or any other country. [Applause.] Were I Mr. Bennett, and asked to choose a sentiment to be put on my tombstone, I would want no better inscription than that brave and timely statement, "I will sell the book and send it by mail." [Applause.] They say he broke the law. What law? The law of ignorance and superstition and intolerance—not the law of liberty, whose seat is in the bosom of truth and whose voice is the harmony of the world. These very judges that condemn us—Judge Clarke, who tried me in Massachusetts, in 1863, then senator from New Hampshire, came all the way down to Faneuil Hall to stand up there and glory in the fact that he had broken United States law—the Fugitive Slave law. The Republican party itself came into power over the ruins of United States law that they gloried in trampling under foot. And as disobedience to United States law furnished a basis for the Republican party, so our friend, by deliberately defying and treading under foot this law, has furnished a platform for the great Liberal League, which is to be the future political power of this country. [Applause.]

They say that he was sent, and it is true to a certain extent, to Albany. My distinguished fellow-citizen in Massachusetts, the Rev. Joseph Cook, speaking of the Albany felon, says he was justly sent there. We know that all these assertions are made because Mr. Bennett, ever since he set foot in New York six years ago, has criticised persistently, relentlessly, but justly, the doctrines and practices of the Christian church. [Applause.] It was heresy, in a certain sense, but it was also for a new heresy, because do not let us leave out of sight here to-night the fact that it is the diffusion of physiological knowledge that is the real crime in this matter. One of the first victims in this city, my distinguished and devoted friend Dr. Foote (whom I am glad to see here to-night), sent a little pamphlet, so small that it could be slipped into an envelope, merely answering qustions that had been asked him repeatedly by his patients. It furnished certain physiological knowledge; same in the Bradlaugh book in England, same in my book. The crime is to impart physiological knowledge. If you read the Comstock statute, you will see it all turns on certain physiological information. Now United States law—I will not call it a law; Charles Sumner never would dignify the Fugitive Slave act by calling it a law; he said it was a bill; and, from his seat in the Senate, he not only advised but urged the citizens of the country to put the infamous thing under foot—this national act and the state act here in New York, and another act in Massachusetts, were drafted in the office of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, on Nassau street, drafted by the advice of the Young Men's Christian Association; and, as I heard a woman say the other night, if we haven't a hell for anything else, we ought to have one large enough to hold the Young Men's Christian Association. (Applause.) All these statutes turn on this point: anything that can inform parents intelligently to regulate the reproductive instinct. These Comstock statutes are so cunningly framed that it is actually a criminal offense to have a syringe in your house. I discussed this point once before a Boston audience—indeed the very one that welcomed Mr. Bennett enthusiastically after he was convicted; and we will give him one ten times as large if he will come there again.

You see the crime is in diffusing knowledge. Now what is this knowledge? It is nothing new. Here sits a man who for thirty years in this city has proclaimed precisely the same things I put into "Cupid's Yokes," and from Stephen Pearl Andrews back to Plato and Jesus, every philosopher in history whose opinion is worth respecting has indicated that intelligence should prevail in love and parentage. That, sir, is the only crime. They call my book hard names. Wait! It is only four years old, and it has already sent three men to prison; it has been pronounced obscene by five United States judges. But it still lives, challenging attention.

I was glad to hear our friend say that he was not sorry. You know they sent him to the Albany Penitentiary to reform him. Do you think he has reformed? I think you will find he is worse than ever; I am sure I am. It did not reform me. I am glad to hear him say he will continue to go on in the old track. He will do it again, and let you and I do likewise. I am glad to announce to you that never for a single week or a single day has "Cupid's Yokes" ceased going through the United States mails. The first article that reached me after I went inside the walls of Dedham Jail was a copy of "Cupid's Yokes," sent me by mail—sent by a nine-year-old girl, my own beloved girl, instructed by unterrified aunties, who then and there vindicated not only the citizen's right but woman's right to freedom of speech, of conscience.

SPEECH OF MOSES HULL.

Ladies and Gentlemen: I am reminded of two things; one is it is late and you are tired, and another is we have a number of speakers here almost ready to burst with big speeches. They want to be heard. This is a great cause and a great time, and they should be heard from. Certainly nothing would have kept me here until this late hour except to honor our friend, D. M. Bennett. [Applause.] A few years ago in the old Bay state, the hot bed of almost every ism and fanaticism in the world, was a man by the name of Thoreau who refused to pay his taxes simply because the government was in league with hell, he said. They put that man in jail. The next day Ralph Waldo Emerson went to the jail and looked through the grating into his cell. He says: "Thoreau, what are you in there for?" Says he: "Emerson, what are you out there for?" The time has come when there is no place for an honest man out of jail. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] And if that is so, D. M. Bennett and E. H. Heywood should certainly be honored. But I said I would not take long. A word about Comstock. I got a little acquainted with him in 1874. I didn't think he was a very bad man. I simply thought he was an abortion, that was all. In 1876 I began to decide that he was decidedly a bad man—one of the worst in the world. In 1877 I thought he was decidedly the worst man in the world. When he arrested Mr. Heywood and Mr. Bennett, and when, in June, 1878, he took three girls that were starving for bread, and hired them to strip themselves and dance and perform before him for about an hour and a quarter, and arrested those poor creatures, I decided then that if there was a hell where the devil presided because he was the greatest sinner that ever lived on earth, and Anthony Comstock died and went down there, if the devil did not arise and say, "Mr. Comstock, you have beaten me; you are entitled to preside," the devil would preside over a meaner man than himself. That is all about Comstock.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, of course there is no time to go into argument. I would like to commence with the time King George asked our fathers what they wanted to go to this continent for, and they were afraid absolutely to give the answer. When they got over here, however, they told the story—they came to found a church without a pope, and a state without a king; came here to be their own men, to do their own thinking, to speak their own thoughts, and live their own lives where they did not interfere with any one else, and asking no boot of anybody. This matter went on for a little while, until a few Scotch Presbyterians discovered we had mislaid God by leaving his name out of the Constitution. They had overshot the mark once; they were trying too much. We asked them to debate. We asked them in DesMoines, Iowa, in Rochester, N. Y., and in the city of Boston. They said they would arrest us unless we kept still. Did we do it? I guess not. And when the Rev. Joe Cook took up the matter it was my lot to answer him. He stood there with books in his hand, and Joseph Cook lied. I will tell you how I can prove it. He gave us the page and the paragraph of a book that he quoted from; then he read directly the opposite of what it said. I got up the next Sunday morning and read the paragraph, and it was exactly opposite in sense to the way he read it, and it was reported in the daily paper. Some friends went to the gentleman and said: "Mr. Hull says you lied; pretty near proved it. He had the very document in his hand you quoted from. He challenges you to meet this thing." "No," says he, "I cannot do it." "Why not?" "Oh, the difference in our social status is so great that I could not; if it were not for that probably I would meet him." This reminds me of the story of a New Jersey deacon. This deacon's parish was very hard up indeed. They had got to deprive themselves of something; what should it be—tobacco, tea, coffee, whisky, or preaching? Which would they do? They couldn't spare any of the necessary articles, and so they concluded they would dispense with the minister. Said the deacon, "I will preach for you a little while for nothing." It was rather a poor preach, though probably just as good as anything else. But his duties were sometimes so onerous that they were not more than half done. In the hurry of preparing his discourse one Sunday morning he forgot to feed the calf until just as he was leaving the house for church. His wife reminded him of it. "Jocob," says she, "you haven't fed that calf." "Well," Jacob replies, "we have time enough to feed him yet." So she gave the deacon a pan of milk and he took it into the yard where the calf was kept. The infantile bovine saw its master approaching, and ran bleating toward him. Going at full tilt he struck the pan with his head, and sent it flying through the air, while the contents was distributed over the deacon's person from head to foot. The deacon seized the calf by the ears, and bellowed, "If it wasn't for the love of Christ I have in my heart, I'd twist your G—d d—d head off." So it is with Joe Cook; if it hadn't been for his social position he would have met me. If they would come out and meet our arguments on these questions; if they would come out and discuss this Comstock act (I am glad somebody says, Don't call it a law); if they would discuss all these acts—discuss freedom of the press and of the mails; if these matters could be made political matters (and they will before many more of our men go to prison), then we would educate the people on those points. I am afraid, ladies and gentleman, nothing will ever be accomplished until that is done. Politicians do not know anything. You never knew a politician in your life that counted sense or brains or noses; they count only one thing, and that is votes. And if the time comes that we must make it a political issue, we should put up D. M. Bennett for President of the United States and poll five hundred thousand votes. Then when these questions come up in Congress, and they ask us whom we represent, we may answer, We represent the half million who voted for D. M. Bennett. Then they will say: "That is a growing party. We had better listen to them." And then the girls won't be taken out of the Treasury Department to make place for superannuated Methodist ministers. The world will grow better and the light will dawn once more.

SPEECH OF DR. R. C. FLOWER, OF PHILADELPHIA.

Ladies and Gentlemen: From the forests of Maine to the flowery gardens of Florida, from the cities of the East to the shaded spots beneath the wild Western canyons, the Liberals of this country have gathered on this occasion to welcome home an old soldier, to welcome a man who has suffered the sorrows of the prison, the ignominy of exile, but who has returned on this occasion carrying the flag of Liberalism higher than ever before.

We have gathered, ladies and gentlemen, to welcome an old man, to shake him by the hand—a man who has demonstrated beyond the possibility of a doubt—a man who has proved that it is impossible for an orthodox court, presided over by a stiff-necked judge, urged on by a miserable sneaking church spy, to shut the mouth of a free man. The court is a mighty mill. Between the millstones of judge and jury tremendous litigants have been crushed. But the court was not powerful enough to stop the free speech of a free man. It never will be in this country again. We have been told by our orthodox priesthood and preachers that children inherit their parents' sins. All the Protestant churches are the offspring of Rome, and I verily believe in this respect the doctrine holds good. I believe that the Protestant churches have inherited the crimes, villainies, the malicious spirit, the cowardly, sneaking nature of the mother of harlots.

Ladies and gentlemen, there is not a crime in the catalogue of sin, there is not a vice in the alphabet of vileness, that the church has not committed.

It is not to be denied that the church robbed, seduced, deceived, murdered, plundered, burned, and tortured Russians, Prussians, French, and English; and they have all, gone down under her iron heel, beneath the blows and moans she heeded not. Now, ladies and gentlemen, this church, this institution with bloody garments and necklace of skulls around her neck, with a smiling face, holding love in one hand but a hidden dagger with poisoned tip in the other; this church put D. M. Bennett in the penitentiary. Great God—if there is one—do you believe, one of you, he was sent to the penitentiary for selling "Cupid's Yokes?" Do you believe he was sent to the penitentiary for sending through the mails an obscene pamphlet? Do you believe Judge Benedict, who boasted one time that he had committed the Bible to heart—do you believe such a one could possibly be hurt with the obscenity of "Cupid's Yokes." If they had become acquainted with their relatives of 3,000 years ago, do you believe the depravity of "Cupid's Yokes" could hurt such men? Be honest, do you think it could? I tell you D. M. Bennett was sent to the penitentiary because he was an Infidel and an honest skeptic, because he dared to write an open letter to Jesus Christ. According to the church, Jesus Christ was D. M. Bennett's elder brother. Now, had not he a right to write a letter to his relative? And according to the same authority Jehovah is D. M. Bennett's father. Hasn't he a right to write a letter to his father? He is getting old, and if he had not hurried up he would not have written to him at all. Think you he was sent to jail for that? No; he was sent to the penitentiary because he published an Infidel paper, because he denounced theology and caused superstition to crumble till those hoary institutions began to fall. Now, I ask your attention, and I will only be a few moments—it is late. D. M. Bennett was sent to the penitentiary for sending a pamphlet, as he states, through the mail to a man writing and signing a false name—a decoy letter. Now, that letter, I believe, if I recollect right, contained nine lies. I believe Anthony Comstock wrote that letter. He is a sweet Christian, a pure, full-blooded Christian. He would pass in Kentucky for one without compunction of guilty conscience. He coolly and deliberately penned nine lies, and there is no law to punish him for sending nine lies—and that is a job lot—through the mails to induce a man who did not want to break the law to break it. Then he turns around, after he has virtually compelled a man to break the law, and jerks him into a narrow cell, out of which there is no exit, and has him convicted. I have read in mythology about the god Creggio Memnon—almost Anthony Comstock. He had a little spite against a man, and he had passed a law making it a penal offense for any woman to yield to the seductive desires of a man. He then induced a king's daughter from another country, by promise of marriage, to come over and visit him, and by his fair palavering speeches he induced that poor child to surrender. Then what did he do? He turned around then and had that poor girl arrested and taken into court and tried for breaking the law. First of all he got the law passed; he then induced her to break the law, and then turned and prosecuted her for breaking the law. She was sent to the penitentiary for thirteen months—it was not a government jail—and I believe she was pardoned out at the end of three months. In the course of time that god disappeared, and, according to the legend, the gods held a congress, and they concluded to clean ont hell to see what was down in hell. They cleared out hell, and finally, when all the slimy, filthy, wiggling wretches had come from the pit, the demon said there was one thing down in the bottom of hell so vile and loathsome that they could not get it up. So the gods ordered that they cast a ball of ipecac as big as the Rocky Mountains into the very depths of hell—ipecac was cheap at that time. Well, so they cast down one ball

James Parton.

While chatting with Mr. Redpath one afternoon in his study, the reporter noticed a letter lying on the table, the writing of which was of a peculiar "scragginess." He called Mr. Redpath's attention to it and asked him whose hieroglyphics those were.

MR. REDPATH: That's a letter from James Parton. . . . It's rather singular, continued he, that there is nowhere a biography of James Parton—nothing but a few dates in cyclopedias—a man who has written more lives of great men and written them better than any author now living. He was born at Canterbury, England, in the shadow of the cathedral, as he expressed it, on February 9, 1822. Seven generations back, when the Huguenots were expelled from France, a Protestant farmer named Pierre Parton settled in Kent and bought land there. That land and the mill on it is now held and run by Peter Parton, the seventh Peter in direct line from the old Huguenot. All the Partons were men of the people; most of them were farmers and millers; "all prolific, good people, of plain ways, with a marked tendency to Liberal opinions," said the Parton—our Parton.

TRUTH SEEKER: James Parton is an extreme Liberal, isn't he?

J. R.: I don't know whether he is an "extreme Liberal" in politics or not. I think not always; but when he is correctly informed as to the facts he is of course. I hav seen criticisms on the careers of Northern men in the South from his pen which he would not hav written if he had known the truth about them. But at that time all the New York papers combined to misrepresent the pioneers of national ideas in the South. As to his religious views, he is a total unbeliever in all supernatural or authoritative religion. He thinks that all religions are of human origin, and that the religion of the future will hav in it no theology and no worship of a deity, but that it will derive its motive power from the love and compassion of man for man. He detests Chadbandism with a lively antipathy. He has fully identified himself with the Free Religious movements in New York and New England. His great ambition for many years past has been to write the standard life of Voltaire, of whom there is no tolerable biography in the English language. He has been engaged on that work for twenty years. He hopes to be able to finish it this year. He told me once: "I hav imported hundreds of volumes from France for the work, and I hope to be able to present Voltaire, fairly and fully, as one of the half-dozen most extraordinary human beings that ever lived."

T. S.: When did Parton come here?

J. R.: Parton's father died when James was an infant. The son came to the United States when he was six years of age. He lived in New York city till he was thirteen, and then went to White Plains for seven years with a view to college and the law. But circumstances prevented him from securing a collegiate education, and from nineteen to twenty-four (with an interval of a year spent in England) he made his living by teaching, mostly in Philadelphia, where, as he said, "I had a nice little classical school."

T. S.: When did he begin his career as an author?

J. R.: Parton has given so entertaining an account of his first essays as an author that you had better copy it. He says: "When Charlotte Bronte's novel of Jane Eyre came out, twenty-two years ago, there was a good deal of talk in the newspapers and country upon the question whether the author was a man or a woman. The title page bore the name of Currer Bell, which was invented by the author for the purpose of concealing her sex. But sex is not so easy to conceal as she seems to hav supposed, and I was perfectly certain myself, as every attentive reader of the work must hav been, that Currer Bell was a woman. I was then a teacher, and, like most teachers, worked very hard for very little money. One evening, when I had finished the labors of the day, I sat down in my exceedingly small room, and wrote a little piece upon this vexed question, in which I gave my reasons for supposing that a woman had written Jane Eyre, the most popular novel of the day. I took a world of pains with this essay, and when I had finished it, about midnight, I flattered myself that I had produced something very convincing and effective. I folded it up in a neat packet, and wrote upon it these words: 'N. Parker Willis, Esq., Editor of the Home Journal.'

"It so happened that I used to pass Mr. Willis's residence every morning on my way to school. It was an elegant but rather small house in Fourth street, near Washington square, and bore upon its front door a large plate, upon which was written the single word 'Willis.' Having had from my youth up the greatest interest in books and the people who wrote them, I had never passed this door without looking at it with curious eyes, wondering how a poet looked, and how he was dressed, and what he had in his parlor, and what he was having for breakfast. . . So, the next morning, instead of passing this door as usual, I mustered up courage to go up to it and ring the bell. The bell was answered by a small but very pretty boy in gray livery, one of those minute servants who used to be styled, in France and England, tigers. To this pleasing youth I handed my packet, and then walked rapidly away to hide a blush. I had not gone twenty steps before I saw this transaction in a very disagreeable light. I felt that I had been doing a very foolish thing; that neither Mr. Willis nor the public needed any instruction upon the authorship of this novel; and that if I could only get my essay back again, I should gladly throw it into the fire. However, the deed was done, and the consequences must be borne."

Mr. Parton then tells how anxiously he awaited the publication of his first essay, and how, after four or five weeks, it appeared with a complimentary introduction by Mr. Willis. "The sight," says Parton, "of my poor little essay, so fairly printed in such a conspicuous place of such a paper threw me into a perfect ecstacy!"

Mr. Parton continued to write for the Home Journal, and at last was employed as the assistant editor. He held this position for two or three years. During the time that he was engaged on the Home Journal, an article on an episode of Horace Greeley's early life was printed in it. Parton, in talking about it in the company of a book-publisher, remarked that a life of Greeley would make an interesting book, if the facts could only be ascertained.

"No doubt," he said, "there are fifty other anecdotes and scenes of Horace Greeley's early life quite as interesting as the episode narrated in the Home Journal, and if any one would go to Vermont and New Hampshire and gather them up, going from house to house and getting them from lips of living persons, the whole story would be as interesting as Franklin's autobiography."

Two or three days after he had made this remark, the publisher met Mr. Parton and surprised him by asking him to go to work on a life of Horace Greeley.

"It seemed at first," he said, "too ridiculous to be entertained;" but the longer he thought over it the less absurd it seemed, and at last he made up his mind to do it, if Mr. Greeley did not object, and would giv him the names and residences of the people who had familiarly known him from early life to the opening of his public career.

"Late one afternoon," says Parton, "I found the editor standing at his desk in the dismal Tribune editorial rooms of that day, writing with his usual velocity. For some time after I entered I stood waiting for him to cease, or to giv some token that he recognized my presence. He continued, however, to scribble with all his might, until I addressed him, and asked when he would be at leisure to listen to what I had to say. He remarked that leisure was a commodity with which he had no acquaintance. He had had none of it for years, and didn't think he should ever hav any more, but that he would listen, then and there, to whatever I had to offer. As he had already received an intimation of the scheme, and expressed no repugnance to it, I had only to make known my name in order to explain my business. He said again that he had no leisure, and could do nothing to assist the project, unless, perhaps, occasionally on Saturday nights, when he had a reception at his house. I told him that all I wished at present was the names and residences of the persons who had known him best from his childhood up.

"Instantly—before I could get my pencil out of my pocket—he began to giv me the names desired. In the course of ten minutes I had a long catalogue written down. Soon after, I made a tour of two months in New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, and Pennsylvania, collecting the anecdotes and incidents which are recorded in the early chapters of my life of Horace Greeley. On returning to New York I bought a complete file of the Tribune for the twelve years of its existence, and borrowed sets of the Jeffersonian, New Yorker, and Log Cabin. Every number of these journals I closely examined, and extracted from each every lurking atom of biography which it may hav contained. It took me six weeks to do it. Eleven months after I entered upon the work, the manuscript was ready for the printer. Before the day of publication—such was the curiosity of the public concerning the foremost editor of the day—seven thousand copies of the work were ordered, and in the course of the first few months about thirty thousand were sold—which, for that day, was a considerable success."

This statement, resumed Mr. Redpath, is not only interesting as a glimpse of Greeley, but as illustrative of Parton's tireless energy. His "Life of Greeley" was an immense success. It established his rank as the best biographer who writes the English language. It has two characteristics that hav shone out in all his writings since—the solid work that distinguishes English and German authorship, and epigramatical brilliancy of statement that is only to be found in French and American literature. His "Life of Greeley" sold to the extent of forty thousand copies—an enormous sale for that day. "I was drawn to Greeley," said Parton to me, "by his standing by the workingmen so gallantly in his paper." Parton, like Greeley, has always been the incorruptible advocate of popular rights. The success of this biography made Parton a professional author.

Two years afterward he published his "Life of Aaron Burr." It proved to be the most popular of all his works. It has still a considerable sale.

Parton's next work was a "Life of Andrew Jackson," in three volumes. The profits of this splendid work were swallowed up in the civil war, for the sales were mostly in the South, where thousands of volumes were delivered but never paid for. This biography was a thorough piece of work. Parton gathered all the materials for it on the spot. Wherever Jackson had lived he visited, beginning in the cellar of the house in North Carolina where Jackson was born. All the old "Jackson men" poured in their stores of letters and recollections of the "hero of New Orleans." No trustworthy history of the United States can ever be written without the aid of this book. N. P. Willis truthfully said of it that "it is as romantic as a medieval romance, and yet has the advantage of being true." Then Parton wrote the "Life of Franklin," in two volumes. John Bigelow, who furnished the world with the first authentic copy of Franklin's autobiography, says that "this delightful book has left no place in English literature for another biography of this most illustrious of our countrymen." Mr. Parton said to me, "Franklin is my best thing, and it had the least sale."

Parton's next large works were the "Life of Thomas Jefferson" and "General Butler in New Orleans." Both Jefferson and Butler are heroes in Parton's Pantheon. These books are as fascinating as novels.

In addition to these works Mr. Parton has published a large volume of "Famous Americans of Recent Times," a collection of biographical sketches of Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Randolph, Girard, Bennett, Goodyear, Vanderbilt, Beecher, Astor, and Theodosia Burr; a large volume of review articles called "Topics of the Times;" and some smaller treatises, among them his famous paper on "Smoking and Drinking." Then he has edited a collection of the "Humorous Poetry of the English Language," and the "French Parnassus," a book of French poetry from 1550 to the present time. And then, besides subscription books, of which I cannot recall the titles, he has written hundreds of historical sketches—I mean literally hundreds. I don't use hundreds as a noun of indefinite number. They hav mostly appeared in the New York Ledger, to which he has been a contributor for years. He always speaks of Bonner as a man of stirling qualities. He once said to me about Bonner, "He is the first man in America who learned how to treat contributors, and this knowledge has made him a millionaire." Parton manages to do so much work well because, like nearly all first-class writers, although he is a terrible toiler, he does not spend much time in writing—not more than five hours a day. He lives at Newburyport, Mass., now. He gets to work as early as possible, about 8 o'clock in the morning, and he works till 1. Then he takes dinner and rests. After that he takes a walk in winter, or exercises in the garden in summer. He is a great lover of the garden. Late in the afternoon he goes to work again in the way of reading and examining things, but not writing. He never works after dark. He spends his evenings at home, reading aloud in his family circle.

T. S.: What's his income?

J. R.: Well, last year I said to Parton that I would like to ask him that question, not from impertinent curiosity, but, taking him as a representative of the literary class, because I wanted to know what an industrious, gifted, and popular author could make from his work in the latter half of the nineteenth century in the United States. I've got his answer filed away. Wait—here it is: "An industrious writer, by the ligitimate exercise of his calling—that is, never writing advertisements or trash for the sake of pay—can just exist, no more. By a compromise, not dishonorable, although exasperating, he can average, during his best years, seven or eight thousand dollars a year. But no man should enter the literary life unless he has a fortune or can liv contentedly on two thousand dollars a year. The best way is to make a fortune first and write afterwards." These are his very words.

T. S.: I see that Mr. Parton holds you responsible for his lecturing career.

J. R.: Yes; I always admired Parton as a writer. I think to-day that he is the best biographer and best magazine essayist living—and I pegged away at him year after year to get him to lecture. He was the hardest man to "bring," as we called it, that I ever "went for," except his friend, Thomas Nast. But finally he came down—or went up—to the lyceum platform.

T. S.: What kind of lecturer is he?

J. R.: He reads admirable lectures—full of the most interesting facts, brilliantly narrated, skilfully contrasted, always instructive. But he is not an orator. No hearer is disappointed in the lecture. But I hav always insisted that no man should ever read to a public audience. I should as soon think of making love to a woman by writing my opinion of her and reading it to her. Parton's first year was a decided success, for he delivered his lecture; but when he read his second lecture he lost a little ground. But he has since recovered his hold on the lyceum. No man is better fitted to elevate its character as a people's college. He is one of the few men who ought to deliver courses of lectures. Then he would get his own select audiences—not the miscellaneous audiences of a regular lyceum—and he would soon be in constant demand. He is one of the half dozen lecturers whom I would go and listen to every night for a month running.

T. S.: What sort of man is he?

J. R.: A sincere, conscientious, courageous, honest man and writer, both. He is tall and spare in person, modest and unpretentious in demeanor. His face is pale and rather sad in expression. He does honor to two great nations—the nation that produced him and the nation that adopted him. I would not say that, or half of it, about many of the celebrities I know. Most of them are great talents, not great men.

D. M. Bennett.

By the time this number of Mind and Matter reaches our readers, Mr. D. M, Bennett, the able, fearless, and devoted editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, will be again at liberty after an imprisonment of thirteen months in the Albany Penitentiary. Mr. Bennett was subjected to that most unjust punishment, in a land where liberty of speech and of the press are the chartered rights of every citizen, for the simple legal act of having sent through the United States mails a copy of a book entitled "Cupid's Yokes," written and published by Mr. E. H. Heywood, deprecating some of the evils which attend prevailing marriage relations and suggesting remedies for those evils. Neither the subject, nor the treatment of that subject by Mr. Heywood, were such as were in the least calculated to incite to lewdness and immorality. On the contrary, they were the reverse, and, if understood in their only proper sense, were well calculated to promote all that is desirable in the true conjugal relations of the sexes. Whether the means recommended to secure the general ends of the publication were wise or otherwise, is a matter about which men and women naturally differ, as they hav a right to do. We frankly confess that we do not think the time has yet come when it would be safe to resort to any radical change in our present marriage laws.

For merely sending a copy of that book, in the regular course of a perfectly legitimate business, through the United States mails, on the order of a hired tool of the Young Men's Christian Association, one Anthony Comstock, a name as odious as that of Judas, Mr. Bennett was arrested on the false charge that he had violated a law of the United States, and was held to answer therefor. On that false charge a United States grand jury of Christian men found an indictment against Mr. Bennett, and he was arraigned before a Christian judge named Benedict, and tried by a traverse jury of Christians. By proceedings, in the name of law, that would hav disgraced a Scroggs or a Jefferies, Judge Benedict had the malicious satisfaction of securing Mr. Bennett's conviction. But knowing that an exhibition of that malice in imposing sentence would defeat a protracted imprisonment of the man he feared and hated, and, to appear to be governed by a sense of justice, he made the sentence what it was. If Mr. Bennett was guilty of the offense with which he was charged, the sentence was too light; but being entirely innocent, as he was, the sentence was a monstrous outrage.

It was not for any offense against the laws of his country that Mr. Bennett, a man declining in years, was tried, condemned, and cruelly imprisoned, but because he was editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and through that journal was shattering the tottering edifice of Christianity to its foundation. Is there any one who is fool enough to believe that the prosecution of Mr. Bennett was honest and in the interest of morality? If so, we would ask him whether he believes Anthony Comstock ever sent a decoy letter to any other bookseller to see whether they were mailing "Cupid's Yokes" to customers? We would ask them if they believe any other bookseller could hav been convicted and punished for selling Mr. Heywood's book? It is absurd to suppose so. A few more such Christian outrages, and Christianity will become so odious to all lovers of justice and mental freedom that it will be swept from the land of Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Paine, and the other founders of the religious liberty of this nation.

On the first page of this number we publish an admirable likeness of Mr. Bennett as he was four years since. We are indebted to Mr. Haskell, the proprietor of the engraving, for the use of it.

We most heartily congratulate Mr. Bennett and his hundreds of thousands of friends that he is again in the editorial chair to push on the cause of free and Liberal thought and to carry dismay to the hearts of those who hav so deeply wronged him.

[From the Daily Truth.]

Freethought Asserting Itself.

The case of D. M. Bennett, who received such a hearty reception, Sunday night, on his return from the Penitentiary, is a peculiar one. He was charged with mailing a pamphlet which contained a discussion adverse to the marriage relation. Of course there is no law prohibiting the publication of a serious decent discussion of the marriage relation either for or against, as this book was; but there is a law prohibiting the mailing of obscene literature. Now, obscene literature has a well-defined meaning to the book trade, and to the public generally. It may probably be briefly described as literature whose intention and sole tendency is to excite lust. But there are many books which may hav this tendency that are nevertheless not obscene, because such tendency is only incidental. Among these may be included medical works, art illustrations, and discussions of certain social subjects. The pamphlet in question was of the latter class, and no one would ever hav thought of declaring it to be obscene had not its conclusions been at variance with the popular belief respecting marriage. The same arguments, illustrations, and language might hav been used with perfect freedom and safety by an author whose conclusions were favorable to the relation, and even this book might hav been sold—indeed it has been largely sold—by publishers who were not identified with Infidelity or Freethought.

But as the author argued against the sacredness of marriage, and the publisher was an Infidel (who, by the way, is not in sympathy with the sentiment of the book), Anthony Comstock made the claim that it was within the restrictions of his postal laws, and Judge Benedict coinciding with him deprived the jury of the right to pass upon its decency. Instead of leaving that question, which is clearly one of fact, to the jury, Judge Benedict defined obscenity broadly enough to cover any book, no matter how valuable, which could by any possibility excite the most morbid, depraved or diseased mind, and instructed the jury that they must take the definition of obscenity from him. Thus Bennett was convicted, although some of the jury protested that in their opinion the book was not obscene.

Of the same book Attorney-General Devens said officially that while its sentiments were repugnant to his own views of the marriage relation he could not regard it as within the law or in any wise an obscene publication.

Now, as already stated, Mr. Bennett's views were at variance with those presented by the pamphlet; but the position that he took was that the author had a right to publish his own views, and to enjoy for them all the ordinary channels of publication. He, therefore, not in the interest of Freelove—not in antagonism to the marriage system—not in any way as an advocate of the doctrines maintained by the book, but in the interest of free thought and a free press, mailed the book to those who sent for it. Among these was Anthony Comstock, who, under a fictitious name and by a decoy letter, procured a copy from Bennett through the mail. He had already sought the conviction of Bennett, for writing an Infidel pamphlet, on the ground that Infidelity is blasphemy, blasphemy is indecency, and indecency is excluded from the mails under criminal penalties. This first prosecution indicates pretty clearly the animus of the second.

Hence, Mr. Bennett's position being that of an advocate of free thought upon all subjects, and a free press its necessary concomitant, and his imprisonment being a part of the price bigotry demands of the pioneers of liberty, it is not strange that his persecution should be regarded as an outrage by all classes of Freethinkers, and that he should hav been received by an immense concourse of New York's most respectable citizens, with an enthusiasm that prophecies a popular uprising against the influences that are secretly at work to stifle free thought in social and religious matters, and crush the American doctrine of a free press. The sentiments of the book should hav no weight with public opinion. If decently expressed, addressed to the intellect and not to the passions, published to spread abroad an honest opinion and not to excite lustful desires—in brief, an honest discussion of a social question and not an evasive contribution to lasciviousness, the conclusions arrived at, no matter how repugnant to accepted views, are entitled to consideration. Were it otherwise, popular errors could never be overcome, for it would be criminal to discuss them.

The right will always prevail at last, and if the opinions of the author of this book are right they will prevail, let persecution be never so severe; but if wrong they will most certainly and speedily be annihilated by free discussion. The individual, therefore, no matter what may be his own opinions, but more especially if adverse to the sentiments whose right to expression he defends, who sacrifices his property, liberty, and peace, to maintain the doctrine of free thought, free discussion, and a free press, is a public benefactor. Such a man is D. M. Bennett, and we say it regardless of his private morality or the opinions of the publication about which his persecution centers.

The American Labor Reform League.

The tenth annual Convention met in Science Hall, New York, Sunday and Monday, May 2d and 3d; J. H. Ingalls, E. H. Heywood, Lucy N. Colman, R. W. Hume, Henry Appleton, J. H. Swain, Col. Henry Beeney, S. Mira Hall, Sadie Bailey, Wm. Hanson, S. P. Andrews, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, Dr. T. L. Brown, Prof. J. H. W. Toohey, Wm. Whittock, Messrs. Sharpe, Skelton, Edward J. Newland and others spoke. Mr. Heywood presented some resolutions, of which the following indicate the principles and purposes of the League:

Resolved, That since labor is the source of wealth, creating all values equitably vendible, the natural basis of ownership is in service rendered, all claims to property beyond the cost of improvement being morally void; and since land is not the product of human effort, but nature's free gift to all, the power to own, rent, or sell land for speculative gain is, theoretically, invasive of natural rights, and practically legalized robbery.

Resolved, That next to Godism which extorts obedience and tribute by threats of a future imaginary hell, the great curse of labor is legalism, the power to torture people in present actual hells, poverty, ostracism, jails, for alleged offenses against the state; that since landlords, usurpers, tax gatherers, and statesmen, like slaveholders, are enemies to natural law and order, by occupying land in and for use, by resisting usury and refusing to bear arms or pay taxes, it is the right and duty of citizens to transcend government.

Resolved, That the imprisonment of Smith, Cheney, and Bennett; of McDonald, Menton, and Kearney; the atrocious proscription of Greenbackers in Congress by Speaker Randall; the harsh cruelties suffered by Irish peasants, German Socialists, and Russian Nihilists, show church and state to be in active conspiracy against growth the world over; that capitalists plotting to crush Socialism by invasive violence in California; savage legalists who hang labor reformers by the score in Pennsylvania, and the lecherous Christians of New York who employ Anthony Comstock to supervise thoughts and morals, must cease their meddling with honest business or share the doom of other aggressors on human rights.

Wm. Rowe, of New Jersey, was re-elected President, and Wm. Hanson and E. H. Heywood, Secretaries. The Monday forenoon session was, as usual, devoted to the American Antislavery Society, Edward Palmer, founder; J. K. Ingalls, President; R. W. Hume, Secretary.

The Citizen, and His Claim to Education.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Purposing, in the course of next month, to treat, to the best of my ability, within the columns of your most valuable journal, upon the above subject, as embracing the very life-question of the republic, I at present confine myself to communicating below to you the three theses which shall be acted upon in the course of next summer by an educational association in their annual meeting, and which shall be made the object of a distinct motion in the next annual congress of the National Liberal League.

I. Our public school cannot come up to its avowed purpose of educating the young to be citizens of our Commonwealth, unless the ground in which the Commonwealth is rooted becomes also the foundation of the public school, and thus the leading, the supreme thought of all popular or national education.

II. And with this it emerges out of the narrower limits of a single nationality, and, freed from all laws, shielding particular interests, it enters the unmeasured realm of the interests of humanity, protected there through the eternal law, which, in the creative act of the 4th of July, 1776, calling this, our Commonwealth, into being, was recognized as the only possible foundation of the latter.

III. The Constitution of the United States of America be so amended that to the youth of the land an education is so guaranteed in the spirit of the Declaration of Independence and the preamble of the Constitution itself.

Respectfully and brotherly yours,

JULIUS REICHHELM.

A Son's Tribute to his Father.

Alvah Walker, father of the noted Dr. Mary Walker, died at Bunker Hill, Oswego Town, N. Y., April 9th on his 82d birthday. On the following Sunday his funeral occurred at the schoolhouse at Bunker Hill, and was attended by a large assemblage of neighbors and friends. The funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Bullock of Oswego, and at its close Alvah H. Walker, who is a Liberal, only son of the deceased, arose, and offered the following peculiar filial tribute over the lifeless body of his father:

"My friends and neighbors, I hav been strongly impressed to-day that what I am about to say is a duty which I owe to my father. I do it without the knowledge or consent of my friends, or any other person, and consequently hold no one responsible for what I may say. It seems to me to be an appropriate occasion to make a few remarks and statements in regard to our earthly father, who has been with us, has toiled and cared for us affectionately, during many long and weary years, often depriving himself comfort and ease that we, his children, might enjoy the benefits of science and the comforts of home. He had his peculiarities, so has every one—and, like humanity everywhere, had his failings. But we think it justly due his memory to challenge a single instance when he ever wilfully wronged his neighbor. And as to his industry and perseverance in trying to make himself useful to the world while in manhood's prime and during his financial prosperity, hundreds can attest to his liberality. And we are willing to compare his life, of which he has kept a daily written record since he was fifteen years of age, with that of any other man of similar circumstances. He always held that a betrayal of anyone's confidence was one of the greatest crimes; and though he devotedly hugged his faith in the atoning merits of Jesus (as he understood it), and answered to the creed and requirements of the Methodist church sufficiently to retain a home with them, he never believed in a literal future burning hell but, as many of you hav often heard him say, that everyone would enjoy hereafter the place (or condition) for which their earth life fitted them. And while we saw an outgrowth of ancient and modern religions with which his was largely tinctured, we saw in him a disposition to accept and advocate, regardless of all creeds, regardless of all isms, whatever in his judgment was right and true. And last, though by no means least, he was determined to maintain his individuality, a synopsis of which would fill volumes with interesting reading. He never allowed another to do his thinking. But being a devoted reader, he read for himself, and no popularity or unpopularity could deter him from expressing that thought regardless of consequences. This last mentioned trait of his character, and this alone, has prompted me (without the knowledge or consent of any one) to forego and stifle my own sympathetic feelings in the endeavor to perpetuate free thought, and the free expression of that thought, which he whose lifeless form now lies before you advocated. If this is faith, then we offer this faith to you, knowing as we do know, that notwithstanding it has often been maligned by ignorance and superstition, if you avail yourselves of its benefits it will make you happy, for it will make you free."

Death of Antoninus Pius.—"Æquanimitas."*

BY ALHAZA.

He lightly touched my lip and brow,
A gentle stranger in the room;
He whispered soft, and on the air
There came a gush of rich perfume.
He breathed of sorrow's calm surcease—
Death's angel, and his name is Peace.

How mildly sets this evening's sun!
My life is spent, my days are over;
My bark has passed through angry seas,
But touched death's delicious shore.
The din of arms, the trumpet's blare,
Are chained in marble silence there.

Pale beauty, stooping o'er my grave,
Shall never more her roses fling,
Lest grief should also pass that way
And dwell—a dark, deserted thing.
These lowliest, creeping leaves may grow,
That bring no thrill of joy or woe.

Oh, I hav done with changeful mirth,
And pain hath left my bosom whole;
Nor mercy's garland can reveal
The healing leaf that wraps my soul.
No Gilead holds a soothing balm
Like death's delicious holy calm.

W. S. Bell in New Haven.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. W. S. Bell, of New Bedford, Mass., lectured here to-night before a large audience, in Loomis' Temple of Music, his subject being "Hell Closed for Repairs." He held his audience for an hour and a half with more than ordinary interest. His lecture was replete with humorous anecdotes, and, as he warmed with his subject, was characterized with eloquent passages. It was his first lecture in New Haven before a Liberal audience, but I trust it will not be his last. He is sure of meeting a large audience, and has succeeded in making many warm friends in the "City of Elms."

It was his first lecture, I understand, of a series to be given on an extended Western trip; and judging from this lecture the tour will be a grand success. Too much can not be said of Mr. Bell's ability to hold a large audience to the close.

of ipecac, and in the course of time out of that pit of hell there came up a creature so nasty that nobody could tell what it was. It was finally discovered that it was this god Creggio Memnon. If in one hundred years from to-nigh you could cast a ball of ipecac into hell as large as one of the Rocky Mountains, and bring up out of that pit all the filthy things and slimy beasts, and there should be something still further down that would not come out, and then, ladies and gentlemen, if you would cast a second ball of lobelia or ipecac or antimony into that pit and bring up that last beast, you might truthfully write on the brow of that villainous creature the name of Anthony Comstock.

Now just one word: Let come what may, let whatever may transpire in the future, John C. Bundy may take notice of this: Let come what may, the name of D. M. Bennett will be by the Liberals of this country engraved upon the rolling car of progress, whose wings never tire, for all coming time.

SPEECH OF PROF. J. H. W. TOOHEY, OF BOSTON.

Mr Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen: I have hardly the heart to ask you at this very late hour to stay and hear the very honest sentiments I would like to express. I came from Chelsea—from Boston—for the purpose of honoring Mr. Bennett. My presence on the platform, my sympathy with the general manifestation of the evening is the best evidence I can give to you at this very late hour, that I am heartily and thoroughly in accord with the sentiment and feeling prevailing in the audience and the respective ladies and gentlemen on the platform. I would have liked, however, if the audience had not been tired by the much protracted conferences of the evening, to have added my intellectual reasons for my presence, as well as for my support of the resolutions; for I would like to have those present bear away with them this reflection, that we have passed resolutions, and that in some sort in the cool atmosphere of to-morrow and during the week we will have to give sensible reasons for their being printed in the newspapers. For one, I have lived a somewhat discriminative life, and have grown old in supporting the several issues that belong to the campaign of the age and the larger campaign of humanity which is animating all countries to-day, and I should be sorry individually to be found in an attitude where I could not have a sensible reason for supporting any position I had indorsed or any conclusion I had reached. More than that, ladies and gentlemen, I would like to impress you with the conviction that you individually in indorsing those resolutions bear testimony against the church, one of the grandest organizations that has ever lived on the planet up to this time, and that when you record your motive of dissent from it, you not only record your dissent from it as a legislative body, but you have virtually pronounced its doom as a historical institution. I know that a greater authority both in scholarship and learning than any that may be present this evening has said Christianitymust die, for men have mistaken it for religion. But I have yet to learn that there was a more serious reason to be given for its immediate death and final extinction. And what is that? Well briefly and summarily it is this. It has been apostrophized on a number of occasions, but let me make you this serious sober reflection to go home on. When I was a boy I was taught to pray, and I have no doubt every person here, man and woman, babe also, received the same benedictions from a mother, baptized with their kisses and their tears—prayed to God to lead us not into temptation; and when I asked how could it be that we should pray to God—he being the fountain of all goodness—not to lead us into temptation, the answer was that inasmuch as infinite perfection has not the right to lead anybody into temptation without abdicating the high attributes of godship and infinity, therefore all meaner traits of character and individuals must of course abandon it. If, therefore, the church has not lost its highest attributes, if God has not been separated from Christianity, then I know of no connection logically significant to be used, and I know no argument that can hold good when put into respectable print.

As a respecter of the religious sentiments of both my father and mother; as a respecter of the religious sentiments of mankind; as a respecter of all that is sacred in human history; as a respecter of the long slavery of woman and the long martyrdom of man, of something that is baptized and consecrated to the struggles of the human family, as I stand here now and ever to bear my open allegiance to that something that prompts us to be better, grander, and nobler than what we are, so by virtue of the same aspiration I condemn the church; condemn it not only to imbecility, but speedy extinction, as an excrement that belongs to other things effete, worn out, and unfit for future use by mankind. [Applause.]

As I stand here to honor my friend—oh, how much I honor him in his old age!—I know that he will not thank me for being his eulogist; it is not necessary. The whole story of the man and his attitude is told in the simple lines of Burns. He has himself lost voice, too, this evening, for he has virtually said, I am not what I would be; I am not what I should be. But in his actions, in his logic, and in his patient forbearanee against the multiplied outrages upon his character, he has said, I would rather be an Atheist clean than wear the gospel cover of a screen, particularly when Anthony Comstock held it.

Ladies and gentlemen of New York, had I an hour at my disposal, and with less fatigue from the evening's wear as well as the night's travel upon me, I would like to aid my feeble testimony with the sensible reasons which history and experience, as a man, has given me to fortify your judgment in support of this issue. I know and I appreciate the dignity of New York, and I know what will be said of New York notwithstanding the imposing presence of this magnificent display of men and women that we have had this evening; but let me assure you that you will find the good and grand applaud all over the land. You have had some indications in the telegrams, but wherever you go you will be respected for this among the other good things in your histories—in your city's history—that you have given one of the most splendid exhibitions of individual vindication that has ever happened to a simple individual in the limits of my knowledge. And thanking you in behalf of Freethought, thanking you in behalf of my friend, thanking you in behalf of the League we have organized in Boston city, may we all go home with that stirring apostrophe which our eloquent friend gave us in the course of the evening—that in the future every man and every woman is expected to continue in their duty!

REMARKS BY MR. T. B. WAKEMAN.

Mr. Chairman: I want to repair an error of mine. I only introduced one-half of Mr. Bennett. I forgot to say when I was speaking that his other half was at home working for him, caring for him, counting the days until his release, bearing the sympathy and name and honor which he needed defenders for at his home, Mrs. Bennett, his friend, his companion for life, his support in his old age! (Applause.)

Mr. Bennett thinks that three cannot make one; he never denied that two did. One thing more. The Liberals of England have sent Bradlaugh to Parliament. One thing more. We ought to see that D. M. Bennett is nominated for Congress. (Applause.)

SPEECH OF DR. T. A. LAMB, OF PORTLAND, ME.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentleman: I came from the state of Maine, one of the most northern states in this great and grand republic over which Mrs. R. B. Hayes has presided with great dignity during the past three years, and with profound propriety I wish, Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, that I had a little more time; but I thank you and all that are present that I have the privilege of being here and meeting our good brother Bennett, with others that I have longed to meet with. I rejoice, Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, that Mr. Bennett lives, and I am glad that we have had the privilege this evening of clasping that hand that has wielded the pen that has elevated so many into a higher plane. I rejoce, ladies and gentlemen, that we have the privilege of meeting him, and I rejoice again that his name and his glorious works will live and continue to live, and that millions of unborn generations will rise up in the future and call his name blessed. I rejoice that millions will read his works when the names of Comstock, Colgate, and Benedict Arnold, and Benedict without the Arnold, have long been lost in the long, dark, blank oblivion.

DR. T. L. BROWN, OF BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

Mr. Chairman, and friends of freedom, those who are not full and remain to get filled, it is never too late an hour in the longest evening to honor and respect a man who has done for us what we would not do for ourselves. [Applause.] He is the honored representative of the nineteenth century, representing liberty, knowledge, and happiness for you and your children in all time while we are governed by honest men. You who are the fathers of families and look in the future for happiness for your children, do not want to find them, because they expressed free thought, in penitentiaries made for Christian profit. Never! In this land of liberty and hope, such men as you have heard speak to-night, and such women, too, are honors to this land, and only carry out the principles of our forefathers. [Applause.]

While the red blood flows through my veins, I am glad to stand here and give testimony for my friend Bennett, who has done more for the liberty of conscience and the liberty of speech within the last thirteen months than any man who ever put pen to paper. Why? Because he gave up all that was dear to him, and went to prison like an honest man, taking what he did not deserve, but did it in the name of free press, free speech, and a free home—a home where a family can reign and speak to the children what they please, making a home for the Christian and for every class who may differ with us and that man who dares to destroy liberty by saying to his neighbor or his children, You must not say this, or that, but give them all an honest chance to present their thought as it comes to them, for I say once for ever, there never was a strictly honest, free thought in that man's mind. He has only received the perception of objects that presented themselves through his senses. He sees what he sees; he hears what he hears, and through every sense the impression he gets is his honest thought, and nothing should prevent his declaring it for the knowledge and use of the race; and you will learn, although it is late, that the more you love the human form, and the less you love gods and priests, the better men and women you will be.

In conclusion, it need only be said that the entire proceedings of the meeting, which continued for over three and a half hours, were marked by enthusiasm, earnestness, and harmony. Everybody present seemed to be joyful over the glad occasion, aud pronounced it the most grand success of anything of the kind they ever attended. After the meeting was over, hundreds of people came upon the platform to take the returned prisoner by the hand and give him a hearty "welcome home." It can hardly be doubted that the effect of the ovation, together with the remembrance of the wrongs and injustice perpetrated by Christian enemies in sending a man to prison whose principal fault consisted in an outspoken expression of honest convictions. though running counter to current theological opinions, has contributed greatly in calling the attention of the general public to Liberalism, in strengthening the feeble, and in intensifying the most earnest in continuing the conflict with superstition and errors of all kinds.

D. M. Bennett's Reception.

BY SADIE BAILEY.

All hail this day of jubilee!
Each voice exultingly we raise;
Around the world the echoes ring,
'Mid grateful hearts and songs of praise.

We meet in one fraternal band.
In the beaming rays of freedom's light,
To welcome home our noble friend,
Our hero of the truth and right.

To commemorate thy greatness now
Is our purpose and our plan;
But, more than this, we celebrate
A true and honest man.

Had Diogenes come searching
An honest man to see,
We'd bade him to thy prison go
And bow assent to thee.

Ah, we pity all thy foes.
Through suffering they will find
The blood of Jesus cannot wash
Their hearts as pure ar thine.

Thy faithful soul of earnest love
In freedom's happinese shall beam;
And now thy cheering presence here
Gives grateful joy supreme.

A loving wife, a welcome home,
Await thy ever-watchful care;
Yea, all the truly free and brave
Rejoice thy earnest work to share.

Against all forms of oppression
Thy crushing master blows shall tend?
And every human heart that's bound
Would find in thee a trusting friend.

True Liberal Leagues throughout the land
Will werk in concert now with thee;
Persecution cannot daunt us;
We'll onward march triumphantly.

Now glorious cheers for D. M. Bennett!
For THE TRUTH SEEKER brave and strong.
Sisters and brothers, we join hands,
And gladly sing sweet freedom's song.

D. M. Bennett's New Work.

Volume I. of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times" (written in prison) is now ready to send to those who hav subscribed for it. Will those who hav sent in their names, ordering a copy, be kind enough to remit for the same and let us send it to them at once? The price is three dollars per volume, or, till July 1st, the two volumes for five dollars. Those who sent three dollars for Volume I. will hav to send only two dollars for Volume II. We think the work will giv satisfaction, and be highly prized by those who read it. It is hoped many more will order the work.

THE few days that we hav passed since we got back home hav been pleasant ones. Numerous friends from various parts of the country hav called upon us. We cannot help feeling grateful to those who hav come hundreds of miles to welcome us home again. We were pleased to take by the hand friends from Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, New York, Michigan, and Illinois. Probably Bro. Wm. M. Bronson, of Streator, Illinois, came farther than any one else—a distance of one thousand miles—and his name should be mentioned. It is no small mark of respect and friendship for a man to make a journey of a thousand miles solely to greet a convict emerging from a felon's cell. The strength of such friendship cannot be doubted. May we never forget the kindness of such true friends.

HAVING now escaped from the clutches of our enemies, and being permitted to resume our legitimate business, we unavoidably feel an anxiety that it may be prosperous. Upon our return we find that THE TRUTH SEEKER has been ably conducted, and that its friends remain loyal and firm. Our hopes are that the paper will continue to liv and flourish. We find but a limited amount of funds on hand with which to meet the heavy expenses which are inevitable. It is our hope that the patronage of friends and readers may be sufficient to keep the business in a healthy, flourishing condition. The names of new subscribers will be gladly added to our list. Orders for books, pamphlets, and tracts will be filled with pleasure. The kindness of patrons and friends hav thus far sustained us, and we hav confidence that the same will be continued.

Age of Chrishna and Buddha.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I notice some of our friends in several Liberal papers giv accounts of the time of Chrishna's and Buddha's birth that do not agree with those given by what I deem very high authority. I am satisfied the missionaries are disposed to lessen the antiquity of dates in Hindoo and Chinese statements. There are some old books called "Asiatic Researches," published about a century ago, that I often see on the catalogues of D. G. Francis, 17 Astor Place, New York city, which I deem invaluable as well as very cheap.

I quote from the old edition in my possession. Sir William Jones, perhaps the most distinguished oriental scholar that ever lived, was president of the Asiatic Society—a society composed of eminent Sanskrit scholars. In Volume I, "On the gods of Greece, Italy, and India," Sir William Jones declares that though he "believes the divinity of our Messiah from the undisputed antiquity of many prophecies and their completion, especially those of Isaiah;" and adds, "but it is not the truth of our national religion that I hav at heart, it is truth itself."

He says Chrishna was the eighth incarnation, and the reformer Sakya Muni, afterwards called Buddh, or Lord, was the ninth, and the tenth is yet to come, mounted on a white horse, with a scimiter blazing like a comet—like him of the Apocalypse. "That the Vedas are older than the flood I never will admit . . . but that they are very ancient, far older than any other Sanskrit composition, I will venture to assert from my own examination of them."

Sir William Jones very foolishly asserts that the "Institutes of Menu, or Minos, are not so old as the Pentateuch, because the Institutes are in most polished Sanskrit, whereas Moses' books are more simple, the Hebrew dialect being more naked or rude."

This would prove the rude old English of four hundred years ago to be more ancient than Cicero's polished Latin, and a book by a Sioux Indian in his rude tongue to be older than either. Blindness of religious bigotry! "Brahma, Vishnu, or Chrishna, and Siva, or Mahadiva, are three forms of one and the same godhead." "It must always be remembered that the learned Indians, as they are instructed by their own books, in truth, acknowledge only one supreme Being, whom they call Brahme." "The second great divinity, Chrishna (after incarnation), passed a life of a most extraordinary and incomprehensible nature. Son of Devacci, by Vasudeva, his birth concealed through fear of Causa, the tyrant, to whom it had been foretold that a child born at that time would destroy him." "In the principal Sanskrit dictionaries, compiled about two thousand years ago, Chrishna, Varadeva, Govinda, and other names of this god are intermixed with epithets of Narayan, or the divine spirit." "He kindled the war described in the great epic poem, the Mahabarat. At its conclusion he returned to his heavenly home, having left his instructions in the Bhagavat Gita."

"One singular fact must not be suffered to pass unnoticed," adds Sir William Jones. "That the name Chrishna and the general outline of his story were long anterior to the birth of our Savior, and probably to the time of Homer, we know very certainly." "There are many sad obstacles to the extension of our pure faith in Hindostan. The Mussulmans are already a kind of heterodox Christians. They firmly believe the immaculate conception, divine character, and miracles of the Messiah, but they deny his character of son and his equality as God with the Father, of whose unity and attributes they hold the most awful ideas. It will be difficult to undeceive them. . . . The Hindoos readily admit the truth of the gospel, and say it is consistent with their sacred books. 'The Deity,' they say, 'has appeared innumerable times in many parts of this world, and of all worlds, for the salvation of his creatures. We all adore the same God,' they say. We may assure ourselves that neither Hindoos nor Moslems will ever be converted by any minion of any church."

Turning to the article "on the literature of the Hindoos," we find innumerable multitudes of works mentioned. "The Vedas, in truth, are infinite, but were reduced by Vyasa." We find the most perfect system of laws, codes, and commentaries thousands of years old. One of the most perfect grammars was made so long ago that the author had become a divinity, after whom a heavenly constellation had been named, far back in the age of fable. The writer adds, "Wherever we direct our attention to Hindoo literature, the notion of infinity presents itself, and the longest life would not suffice for the perusal of nearly five hundred thousand stanzas in the Puranas, with a million more perhaps in the other works before mentioned.

In the third discourse, Sir William Jones says: "We now liv among the adorers of those very deities who were worshiped under different names in old Greece and Italy and among the professors of those philosophical tenets which the Ionic and Attic writers illustrated with all the beauties of their melodious language. On the one hand we see the trident of Neptune, the eagle of Jupiter, the bow of Cupid, and the chariot of the sun; on the other we hear the cymbals of Rhea, the songs of the Muses, and the pastorals of Apollo. In more retired scenes, in groves and seminaries of learning, we may perceive the Brahmans and Sarmanes, mentioned by Clemens, disputing on the forms of logic or the vanity of human enjoyments; on the immortality of the soul; her emanation from the eternal mind; her debasement, wanderings, and final union with her source."

"We may fix the time of Buddha, the ninth great incarnation of Vishnu, in the year one thousand and fourteen before Christ. We hav, therefore, determined another epoch by fixing the age of Chrishna near the three thousandeth year from the present time."

No one can read these volumes without being satisfied that the Hindoos were, many thousands of years before Rome or Greece were ever heard of, one of the most highly enlightened nations that ever lived upon the earth. We find in these volumes that Buddha was born of the Virgin Maia, a son of God, and that this incarnation was predicted by prophets long before. We also learn the same stories as are found in Genesis about the creation and deluge, the very names of persons being almost the same. We know that Alexander, some three hundred years before Christ, found about the same condition of affairs prevailed in India then as prevailed until very lately. We find in the history of the pious Rollin that Semiramis invaded India within a very few years after the flood and found a densely-peopled region, the people using elephants in warfare—a fact that puzzled the good man, seeing there could not hav been over five or six hundred persons in all the world at that time, without a multiplication equal to that of Dan, old Jacob's son, who went down into Egypt as one person and came up out of there with over sixty thousand of his descendants, armed and fit for war, men, besides women and children, in two hundred and seventeen years.

But leaving that out of consideration, is it in the least probable that a highly-enlightened nation, with an established religion, as all admit, long prior to the time of Christ, and a priesthood as learned and proud as theirs, would hav either had no sacred books till long after Jesus's day, or, having them, would hav suppressed them and adopted the Bible of the Jews and New Testament of the Christians, not as a whole, but in fragments so poorly disguised that any one must be able to see through the attempt?

Here is the dilemma, and under heaven there is no way of escape from it. Either that nation has done so or the holy Bible story is principally stolen from India. Fourteen hundred years before Christ, Moses appeared and led the three million Israelites out of Egypt, over the desert, toward the promised land. Theologians admit the book was written after the captivity, some 500 years B. C., being 500 years after the Christian doctrines of Chrishna in the Gita were left to his follower Arjuna, and some 500 years before the occurrence of that wonderful event and sole evidence as to the divine conception of Virgin Mary, to wit: the dream of the old man, Joseph, reported to us at second hand—evidence that could not settle a ten-cent claim in a court of justice. Think of it! Christian priests charge upon whole nations, races, and generations of enlightened people that they stole their religions and deliberately falsified their records, their priests consenting, while the people from whom they themselves drew the story of their own religion were so miraculously truthful that the mere rumor of an old, uxuorius man's dream among them stands as the everlasting basis and proof that a virgin of their people had conceived by the Holy Ghost a son, whose father was and is the Infinite Being by whose omnipotent processes all the countless worlds on worlds rolling in space are generated and conserved. But that is not the wonder. The wonder is that any one should pretend to believe it. It beats the miracle!

In volume sixth of these Researches is a description of the rock-cut temples of Ellora, India. But for the influence of priestcraft these wonderful works would long ago hav eclipsed, in public opinion, the pyramids of Egypt. There was more labor, more taste, genius, and expense in excavating one of these temples than in building all the pyramids. Yet so powerful is priestcraft that they are unknown to us. The cause is plain. They contain proofs positive that they were made long before Moses' world. The Brahmans say some of the subterranean temples are 7,894 years old. According to these reports that would make them now nearly 8,000 years old. The invading Moslems say they are only 900 years old. Captain Seeley, of the Bombay Infantry, visited these temples about 1820, and I hav his account, published in 1824, entitled "The Wonders of Ellora." He says: "It is impossible to describe the feelings of admiration and awe excited in the mind on first beholding these immortal works. The feelings are interested to a degree of awe, wonder, and delight that is at first painful."

One whole side of this paper would be required to print the exclamations of wonder and delight used by this honest, unsophisticated man to express his feelings. I giv a few of them: "The approach is over a large plain to a range of mountains one hundred feet high, rising suddenly like a wall, and being of solid granite. Bear in mind these temples are all cut out of this solid granite, and everything is finished to perfection. One temple was first finished and then another begun by making a doorway out of it into the heart of the mountain. Then an area, several feet wide, is excavated clear around the next proposed temple, thus leaving a square block of granite out of which to hew the temple, with its walls, doors, columns, pillars, monuments, windows, altars, galleries, aisles, stairways, verandas, ornaments, etc., etc. This temple finished, on into the heart of the mountain continue the workmen, on and on until an indefinite number of temples hav been finished. When we know that St. Peter's and the Milan Cathedrals are not yet finished, although they were undertaken several centuries ago, and the workmen are yet busy on them, that a very large number of men could hav been engaged on them from the start, and that only two or three at most could begin on these excavations, we become satisfied that it has required several centuries, if not thousands of years, to perform these works. Just think of it! Standing about the entrances to some of these excavations are columns, or obelisks, equal to that called Cleopatra's Needle, carved in the heart of this granite rock! Imagine a solid granite boulder standing on the surface of the earth, say one hundred feet high, four miles wide, and twenty-five miles long. Now imagine that men began to cut into this boulder, making a large doorway, then an area say forty feet high, forty-four feet deep, and fifty feet broad, all around; then a beautiful temple to be carved out of the square, having rooms, stairways, upper rooms, etc.; and so on through until many temples hav been so excavated. In one case a temple within a very large temple—a perfect little gem—has been made. Now you may hav some idea of the mighty work."

C. W. Mallet, in volume six of "Asiatic Researches," says: "Whether we consider the design or execution of these mighty works, we are lost in wonder at the idea of forming a vast mountain into almost eternal mansions."

Seeley says: "Conceive the burst of surprise at suddenly coming upon a stupendous temple, within a large open court, hewn out of solid rock, with all its parts perfect and beautiful, detached from the surrounding mountain of rock by a spacious area all around, 200 feet deep, 150 feet broad, this fane rearing its rocky head to nearly 100 feet high, its length 145 feet by 62 feet broad, having well-formed doorways, windows, staircases to its upper floor, containing fine large rooms of a smooth and polished surface, regularly divided by rows of pillars, the whole bulk of this isolated excavation being 500 feet in circumference, and, wonderful to say, having beyond its areas three handsome figure galleries, or verandas, supported by regular pillars, with compartments hewn out of the boundary scarp, containing 42 curious gigantic figures, the whole three galleries in continuity, inclosing the areas and occupying the incredible space of nearly 420 feet of excavated rock, being 13 feet 2 inches broad all around and 14 1-2 feet high, while positively above these galleries again are excavated fine large rooms. Within the court and opposite these galleries stands Keylas the Proud, wonderfully towering, a mighty fabric of rock, surpassed by no relic of antiquity in this world."

Let that serve for a description of each one, for the writer is newly surprised as each area door is passed. He asks, "What are all the wonders of the world, all the remains of Egypt, the Parthenon, the Pantheon, St. Peters, in comparison with one of these? The work seems beyond belief, and the mind is utterly bewildered in amazement." "Human language cannot describe them or one's feelings at the sight." "At first view it strikes the beholder with a delight and wonder indescribable; the mind is so absolutely lost in admiration and so transfixed that one feels incapable of describing. It is long, very long indeed before the mind becomes calm enough to enable the writer to behold attentively."

"Glorious memento of a race superior to the present!" The statuary carved out of the same material as the temples in number and perfection would alone make the reputation of the grandest modern museum. "What incredible labor, to carve with a simple iron instrument out of this solid, hardest of all rock, not only temples and habitations, but pillars, devices, figures, ornaments, etc., etc., cutting hundreds of thousands of feet of that hard material." "Surely it exceeds belief." "Man has here gone beyond himself." "All the existing works of man will decay, whilst the caverned temples of Ellora shall rear their indestructible and hoary heads in stern loneliness, the glory of past ages, the wonder of the ages yet to come."

BY

M. BABCOCK.

This book contains an inspired PHOTOGRAPH of the GOD that's being worshiped at the expense of the district in our public schools; the God that "overshadowed" Mary; the God that's wanted in the Constitution; the gentleman that owns some three billion dollars' worth of untaxed church property; the "so-help-me" God that makes a lie the truth in court; the God that governors besought to stop the yellow fever, which he didn't do. The picture is worth the price of the book.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1879, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth: price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

CONCERNING

Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

A Few Words About the Devil,

And Other Biographical Sketches and Essays.

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second edition, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1 25.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him.—The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

Martyrdom of Man

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $1.75.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to daman the wheels and the springs?

AUTHORITIES.—On Egypt, Wilkinson, Rawlinson's Herodotus, Bunsen; Ethiopia or Abyssinia, Bruce, Baker, Lepsius; Carthage, Heeren's African Nations, Niebuhr, Mommsen; East Africa, Vincent's Periplus, Guillain, Hakluyt Society's Publications; Moslem Africa (Central), Park, Caille, Denham and Clapperton, Lander, Barth, Ibn Batu'a, Leo Africanus; Guinea and South Africa, Azurara, Barros, Major, Hakluyt Purchas, Livingstone.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill."—Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—Penn Monthly.

We could scarcely hav supposed it possible for any writer, however gifted, to put into one volume, reasonable in size and price, so much reliable information, sound logic, and inspiring thought.—Literary Review.

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY,

BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,

Graduate of the Hygeio-Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.

The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Issues of the Age.

CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED IN MODERN THOUGHT.

BY HENRY C. PEDDER.

Extra cloth, beveled, black and gold back and side stamps, 12mo, 185 pp., price, $1.00.

Everything that we now deem of antiquity was at one time new; and what we now defend by examples will at a future period staud as precedents.—Tacitus.

An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.

He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces a therough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

BY L. FEUERBACH,

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc.

Translated from the German.

Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

THE POCASSET TRAGEDY THE LEGITIMATE FRUITS OF CHRISTIANITY.

A Discourse by

Infidel Integrity versus Christian Creed.
Separation of Church and State.
The Spiritual Philosophy, what it is and what it is not.
The Sunday Question.
Thomas Paine, Patriot and Hero.
Crime and its Causes; or, What shall we do to be saved?
After Liberalism, What?
Life beyond the Grave.
Jesus Christ, the Reformer.
The Three Tyrannies.
The Old Error and the New Truth.
The Scientific Aspect of Prayer, etc., etc.

VOLUNTARY OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

A lecture replete with eloquence.—San Francisco Chronicle.

She is a powerful advocate of the cause she has espoused.—San Jose Mercury.

Mrs. Lake is the best lady lecturer that has ever appeared before a Portland audience.—Portland Oregonian.

As a speaker she is vastly superior to auy woman we hav ever heard; for beauty of diction, depth of thought, and grace in delivery she is remarkable.—Salem (Or.) Record.

She has the power of entrancing her audience, and, by her eloquence, commanding the respect of those most opposed to her.—Corvallis Gazette.

Mrs. Lake is one of the finest orators we hav ever listened to. Can hardly be excelled by any speaker on this coast, either man or woman.—Yreka Journal.

Her eloquence and masterly style giv evidence of a highly cultivated mind as well as a complete comprehension of her subject.—Eureka (Nev.) Sentinel.

Whatever cause she espouses has in her an advocate of more power and brilliancy than is usually found on the rostrum, and her influence will be felt wherever she goes.—Council Bluffs Nonpareil.

Pleasant appearance, graceful carriage, a good elocutionist, eloquent, using well-chosen language to express her ideas.—Clinton Herald.

Mrs. Lake is a brilliant speaker, finely cultured, a trained elocutionist, and a powerful advocate of truth, reason, and constitutional liberty.—Le Claire Pilot.

She may be addressed, Clinton, Iowa.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

Tyndall's Belfast Inaugural Address

and the famous articles of

Prof. Tyndall and Sir Henry Thompson

ON PRAYER.

With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of Prof. Tyndall. And opinions of his services by the eminent scientist, Prof.

H. HELMHOLTZ.

Paper, 12mo, 105pp., 25 cts.; cloth, heavy tinted paper, 50 cts. Inaugural and portrait only, 12mo, paper, 69pp., 10 cts.

Prof. Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world. —N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in th world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

The Best on this Theme Yet.

"AN ESSAY ON THE BIBLE NARRATIVE OF CREATION."

By Augustus R. Grote, A.M.

The Boston Commonwealth says: It is a rationalistic examination of the scripture account, with a conclusion that the literal teaching of the theory is injurious to the mind, as it proves an impediment to intellectual advancement.

The Boston Traveler says: He has given a clear, yet condensed, criticism from the literary and scientific points of view. An eloquent and forcible protest against the tyranny of dogma. He endeavors to show that all efforts to reconcile science with a literal interpretation of the account of Genesis must only end in confusion.

The Popular Science Monthly says: The discrepancies between the two accounts are very fully indicated, and the different points of view from which they were written explained. . . . Interesting chapters follow on the myths of the old world, which resemble those of Genesis. . . . The book is characterized by directness of argument, and the best material has been diligently used. . . . The archæologist and philologist will find many new points in the book, which is noteworthy for its additions to science as well as for its distinctive literary merits. Paper 40 cents. For sale by

STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,

141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

Notes and Clippings.

HE asked a Cincinnati bell if there was much refinement and culture in that city, and she replied, "You just bet your boots we're cultured to kill."

THE condor of the Andes is said to kill its prey with its bill, and the up-town milliners of this city are trying the same game on the married men.

A LITTLE girl, aged three, went to church lately to see a christening. When, on her return, she was asked what she thought of the babe, she replied, "It was a good baby; it did not cry when the gentleman washed its head."

MR. D. M. BENNETT, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, received an enthusiastic welcome on his return from prison, at Chickering Hall, on Sunday night. The audience was a truly representative one of free thought, free speech, and a free press. A "Song of Welcome" was sung by a quartette choir.—American Art Journal.

D. M. BENNETT, having served out his term of sentence in the penitentiary for sending a copy of an alleged immoral book—we hav never seen it—through post, has been discharged. "Nana," an immoral book—which we hav seen—is still in the market and is sold by "respectable publishers;" and that, we suppose, makes all the difference.—Star.

THE Young Men's Christian Association of Seneca Falls, N. Y., has collapsed for want of patronage, the members preferring to go to hell rather than pay the bills. In fact, Christianity is at a discount in that place. They hav seven churches besides several side shows, and the oldest settled minister having been there less than three years, proposes to quit business unless they pay him.

BENNETT Reception, Chickering Hall, Sunday evening, May 2 i. Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has been imprisoned the past year on a charge of mailing a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" to a sham address sent in a decoy letter by Anthony Comstock. Mr. Bennett's friends, in testimony of their regard for his devotion to the principles of free press, free speech, and free mails, will giv him a grand reception on his liberation from prison.—Jersey City Evening Journal.

THE Rev. Charles B. Ramsdell has been pastor of the North Presbyterian church, Washington, since 1875, and has brought it up from a condition of poverty to one of considerable prosperity. But he has offended his congregation, or at least a good part of it, by marrying a Roman Catholic girl. She is amiable, refined and good, but sticks to her religion, though she frequently goes to hear her husband preach. One church meeting has been held for the purpose of compelling him to resign, but he proposes to stay.

THE D. M. Bennett Reception in Chickering Hall, New York, last Sunday night, was a tremendous affair. It was not only one of the largest, but one of the most if not the most enthusiastic ever held in the city. A full report of the meeting and the speeches in full will be published, we understand, in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We regret that we were unable to attend the convention, but the Liberals of this city were well represented by Dr. R. C. Flower, who, we are informed, did not forget to pay his respects to Anthony Comstock in his peculiar and sarcastic manner. The meeting was a great victory for D. M. Bennett, but a greater victory for the Liberal cause.—Mind and Matter.

MISS NORWOOD, a lady in the American mission at Swatow, has given some interesting particulars as to feet distortion in China. This abominable barbarism is determined by locality rather than by the rank and wealth of those who practice it. It is vehemently opposed by the "Hakkas," and where people of this province—who, happily for Chinese women, seem to hav nomadic habits—settle it begins to disappear. Of the women attending the missionary school in Swatow about sixty per cent hav their feet bound. The binding does not take place until after a child has learned to walk. The pain is intense when the process is performed in the case of an adult, and a source of dreadful discomfort in any case, yet the desire to hav small feet is so intense that that girl's will slyly tighten their own bandages in spite of the pain. This binding, the Chinese themselves admit, often produces, among other evils, blindness.

PRAYER FOR RAIN.—We the undersigned ministers of the gospel in Reno county, recommend that the fourth Sabbath of this month (25th inst.) be especially observed as a day of humiliation and prayer in the worship of Almighty God, that he would graciously hav mercy upon us, and bestow upon our land needed rain and all the conditions of a fruitful season, that the labor of the husbandman may not be in vain. Having the divine promise, and the example of the prophet Elijah, we are encouraged to pray. Let us all exercise faith and obedience to him "in whom we liv, and move, and hav our being."

Signed: SAMUEL DILLY, WM FERGUSON, SAMUEL BACON, D. M. MOORE, D. P. MITCHELL, E. B. TUCKER.

—Hutchinson (Kan.) Interior.

If these men find their influence at the court of heaven is potent, and they can bring rain when they wish it, they could undoubtedly do a very profitable business by traveling from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific, especially through the summer season, bringing rain where greatly needed. If they succeed in getting this quarter of the globe well watered, they will be able to find steady employment in portions of Asia and Africa, where rains are of rare occurrence. How handy it must be for God to hav men tell him when and where to hav his rains descend.

IF London Life is to be believed, Mrs. Victoria Woodhull has achieved a notable triumph in her three years of self-banishment from the United States. In the Great Britain metropolis this celebrated lady has achieved a wonderful success. She lives in the largest house at Emperor's Gate, South Kensington, and the interior of her home "conveys at a glance the impression of wealth, intellect, and common sense." "Graceful, elegant, and striking; full of self-possession and of bright ideas," "amiable, cultivated, and with great natural ability," it is no wonder to the British journalist that she has "made her way rapidly in society, an important section of which she may be said to hav at once taken by storm." Victorious Victoria! Alas! that having now "passed beyond the wear and tear of business and political strife," she is about to "unite her happiness with that of an Englishman for whom the world has naught but praise." With this perished every fond hope that the Woodhull would enter into the Presidential field this year and add piquancy to what promises to be a very lively canvas. Yet we hav the consolation of knowing that London is to hav in her "a queen of the drawing-room," and that she is to be "surrounded with all that is brightest in the life of Great Britain." If she will only rid us at the same time of the race of young American snobs who admire nothing that is not English we shall be happy all around.—Sunday Mercury.

MISS MARIAN EVANS, better known as "George Eliot," has been led to the altar by an unknown and perhaps fortunate gentleman of the unromantic name of Cross. The author of "Adam Bede," "Middlemarch," "Daniel Deronda," and other well-known novels, is about sixty years of age, having been born in 1820. Her relations with Mr. Lewes were similar to those of the Countess Guicciola with Lord Byron, rather free and easy for staid old England. Mr. Lewes could not marry her on account of a little legal barrier which had its origin in the gentleman's marriage with another lady, and which could not be well overcome. Mr. Lewes has been dead about one year and "George Eliot" has found consolation in another mate. The marriage of Mrs. Norton, one of the celebrated Sheridan sisters with Sir William Maxwell, surprised the English world. The poetess was older than "George Eliot" by ten years. There is nothing to wonder at in the love and marriage of people of genius who hav reached the fifties and even the sixties. The souls of such people never grow old and never lose their sentimentality. There is about their hearts a halo of youth which defies the sweep of time. Before any one smiles at the supposed weakness of "George Eliot," it is best to remember that women of genius are not to be measured by the ordinary human standard.

BY 7.30 o'clock Chickering Hall was packed to the very doors. Standing room was at a premium and numbers of persons were sitting on the steps outside in the hope that something might turn up whereby they could gain an entrance. By 8 o'clock it was utterly impossible to wedge one's way through the solid phalanx of people about the doors, and hundreds were compelled to go away. The attraction of this vast multitude was the reception of D. M. Bennett, the Freethinker, who has just been released from state prison. The Hon. Elizur Wright presided at the meeting, and stated that they had met last night in the name of common sense and common humanity—that they were friends of the law of free thought and speech. "What is law," he said, "without liberty? What is enforced morality worth?" He denounced the system of government advocated by the Comstock party. He then introduced Mr. Thaddeus B. Wakeman, who spoke at considerable length upon the connection of church and state, and the evils that would naturally result from Comstock legislation, which he characterized as a direct infringment upon the laws and Constitution of the the United States He characterized such legislation as anti-Republican, un-Democratic and fundamentally wrong. He expressed the greatest humiliation that Dr. Crosby should hav publicly advocated lying and falsehood as the basis of public morality. The speaker asserted that there was no way of getting to heaven until the people know how to stop lying. He had hoped to present Mr. Bennett in his prison clothing, but suits of that character were so much in demand that it was impossible to get one. He would therefore hav to introduce Mr. Bennett in plain clothing. He then took this celebrated person by the hand, and leading him forward introduced him. The applause, which had hitherto been most uproarious and frequent, now burst forth into a perfect storm. The audience appeared to be composed of the most respectable people but they allowed their enthusiasm to master them, and men and women alike arose in their seats, waved their hats and handkerchiefs and shouted until they were hoarse. This continued for fully ten minutes, and then a man arose in the gallery and proposed three cheers for Bennett, which were given with such vehemence as to almost unroof the building. A large bouquet of roses was presented to the liberated Freethinker, and finally, when the audience had somewhat quieted down, he advanced to the front, and, with tears in his eyes and a trembling voice, thanked the audience for the reception. He said that it was the proudest moment of his life. "I don't want to do anythin wrong, but I will go into a prison cell again before I will be a coward and refuse to act against my best belief and knowledge of right." He continued to speak of the persecutions he had endured and of his prison life, which latter was very rough. He denounced Dr. Crosby in very severe terms, and the audience applauded to the echo. His concluding sentence was, "I am resolved to be a good citizen; I will speak the truth and I will print it." A number of speakers followed, who were very severe upon Dr. Crosby and Anthony Comstock. Whenever the name of the latter was mentioned it was met with the strongest hisses. Telegrams were read from all over the United States and from Canada, congratulating Bennett and stating that mass meetings were being held in honor of the event. Among other resolutions the following were adopted: Resolved, That we deliberately denounce the Comstock legislation, as to its hidden and real animus, which is the suppression of Freethought and the freedom of the press; and the rulings of Judge Benedict in the case of Bennett; and the refusal of President Hayes to interfere, as a legislative, a judicial, and administrative outrage; and that we pledge ourselves to continue to do whatsoever true men and true women may rightly do to reverse this whole current of procedure. Resolved, That if it were not too melancholy and dangerous, it would be comically ludicrous to behold the gigantic machinery of the United States government invoked to punish by ten years' imprisonment, and five thousand dollars fine some thoughtless or angry boy or man who had sent a naughty word on paper through the post-office to some one who, to protect himself, has only to decline to read what is sent him, or throw it into the waste basket; and that this great country is now afflicted and disgraced, through the activity of a few over zealous bigots, by a new edition of Connecticut Blue laws so ridiculous that the people almost refuse as yet to believe in their existence.—Truth.

"Does Death End All?"—Part Second.

BY E. A. CHAPMAN.

In a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER I tried to show from a scientific standpoint that "man is a spirit," and that "the spirit of man is immortal." No matter how well I may hav succeeded, like every effort of the kind that has ever been made, or ever will be, from the same standpoint, to a certain extent it was a failure. I did not giv absolute proof. There is one and only one way to prove absolutely a future existence. We must bridge the river of death. We must cross it ourselves, or talk with those who hav recrossed it from the other sphere. Columbus could prove scientifically that a new world existed across the waters, but he proved it absolutely when he crossed the ocean and saw that world with his own eyes. His countrymen knew when he returned that he told the truth. That other world then became a demonstrated fact. The world has always been satisfied with reasoning from cause to effect or from effect to cause on every other question but the duality and immortality of man. It is extremely difficult to prove that from matter is evolved a force that is positive to matter, that commands while matter obeys. It is still more difficult to prove that this something, this invisible positive power and principle, becomes individualized into an immortal spirit, a being that is to liv and progress forever in a future world.

There has always been an intuitive principle in man, independent of reason, that has told him he was an immortal being. But all this is not satisfactory. To-day the world outside of the Christian church demands facts that may be accepted as absolute proof of immortality. Again is verified that infinite love of nature for her children. A reasonable demand she always satisfies. No more auspicious time could possibly hav been selected for the advent of modern Spiritualism than the middle of the nineteenth century, and in this land of Paine, Franklin, Washington, and Lincoln. The great disciples of Materialistic science who declare that "Death ends all" must be checkmated, for when the greatest minds on earth become involved in error their power for evil is incalculable. At no time in the past has it been possible for the spirit world to furnish proofs of a future existence without endangering the lives of the medium until this free government was instituted, where "no law could ever be enacted for the establishment of religion," or to prevent "the free exercise thereof."

Spiritualism is an acknowledged fact throughout the world. Starting in the bosom of this free government, it quickly spread throughout the whole earth, and to-day Spiritualism givs to us the only absolute proofs the race can ever know of a life beyond the grave. Our friends, "the loved of other days," hav "bridged the river of death," and solved forever the great problem of immortality. Because they liv we shall liv also. All over this earth, in millions of homes, the loved of other days are giving the most convincing proofs of their presence and identity. Modern Spiritualism, with its mighty influx of spirit power, wisdom, and love, is rapidly dispersing the black clouds of superstition and freeing the people from the worst slavery this world has ever known. Already it has won its way into every royal palace in Europe. The most learned and scientific of the age hav examined the phenomena of Spiritualism and declare it to be just what it purports to be, a power and intelligence from the spirit world. They declare they hav conversed with friends of other days, the so-called dead, now in spirit life. Millions of the best men and women living, whose word would be unquestioned on all other subjects, say positively they not only believe but know they hav received living messages and proofs of identity from the "so-called dead." Collect all the evidence of the truth of modern Spiritualism into one book, and giv it to the world as a Bible revelation, and in eighteen hundred years skeptics would be as scattering as angels' visits to Christians. Those who are striving to resist and destroy Spiritualism are fighting the mightiest power and the most irresistible movement this world has ever known. The mighty hosts of the ages gone before hav marshaled their forces, and despite the feeble cry of the infants to-day, are lifting the people up out of the ruts and the slime and mire of superstition and placing them upon the glorious hilltops of free thought and mental liberty. As well attempt to turn back the mighty Niagara or still the increasing swells of the great deep as to resist the power in and from the other world that is to-day sweeping over this earth.

Priestly bigots denounce and ridicule it because it sweeps away the whole church fabric of hypocrisy and superstition. Scientific bigots ignore and denounce it because Christians and all the little bigots applaud, and because the phenomena of Spiritualism cannot be weighed in their Materialistic scales, nor ciphered out by the rules of sensation. The spirit world would hav furnished these proofs long ago could it hav been done without compromising the lives and liberties of the mediums, the instruments through whom these manifestations must come. As it is, even in this day of so-called enlightenment, mediums are reviled and persecuted as ignorantly as was Jesus Christ eighteen hundred years ago. Lies and ridicule are the weapons used to crush truth to-day instead of the stake, the rack, the thumbscrew, and the slimy dungeon.

Absolute monarchies, despotisms, and holy inquisitions are things of the past. The world evidently is progressing. The dark night of superstition is passing away. The glorious sun of reason and truth is rapidly illuminating the entire earth. A few years hence and people will cease to ridicule the truth, for when might no longer is the slanderer of right, and the church has gone the way of all error, then it will be unpopular to do so. Those who hav dared to be unpopular hav been the pioneers of truth in all ages.

When our loved ones leave us it is needlessly cruel and unjust to keep us in suspense as to their whereabouts and condition until we too go to the unknown shore. If they liv and still possess all the attributes of the soul, they love us still, and must be anxious concerning the welfare of those left behind. This earth is the natural dwelling place of the race, and here not only spirits in the body, but spirits out of the body dwell; and could our spiritual vision be opened now, as it will be when we pass to spirit life, we should realize there is but a thin veil between the two worlds, between us and our spirit friends. If they love us still it is right for them to manifest their presence and love whenever they can find the means to do so. If we are to liv hereafter, it is right for us to know it, and if our friends desire to communicate with us, it is right for them to do so, and it is our duty to aid them all we can. If it were not for priestly cowardice, the very suspicion that a way had been opened whereby news could be received from friends in spirit life would be received with universal and unbounded satisfaction.

Unfortunately spirits tell us that the Bible is a man-made book; that Jehovah, the devil, the Christian heaven and hell, are myths. They hav exploded those precious doctrines, "the fall of man," "total depravity," "everlasting punishment," and the "atonement." They hav shown that the priests are the worst villains and hypocrites that ever walked this earth, and consequently all their concentrated venom is poured, not only weekly, but daily and hourly into the too willing ears of their victims. Our spirit friends tell us it is our duty to reason and think for ouselves, and not substitute faith or hire others to do it for us; therefore Spiritualism owes to the cupidity, hypocrisy, and revengeful malice of the priest all the opposition it meets with to-day at the hands of the people.

Liberals should carefully consider this matter. Perhaps their minds are influenced to a large extent by this wave of unpopularity, first set in motion by these wicked, lazy, lying, worthless representatives of the great Jehovah. Christian priests hav been guilty in every age of all phases of hypocrisy and meanness. Millions of times they hav perpetrated every known species of cruelty and crime, hav kept the world in turmoil, tears, and bloodshed; but in this nineteenth century all their wickedness is boiled down into venomous lies concerning the most glorious gift the world has ever received. Let them lie and scandalize. It is their death struggle. The world is beginning to realize that these priests, from purely selfish motives, hav cursed the world and blocked the wheels of progress for eighteen hundred years with their accursed Bible and false notions of future existence. The world, realizing the mighty wrongs it has received at their hands, is crying, "Put them out! put them out!" They already read the handwriting on the wall, "Ye are weighed and found wanting."

It is a matter of regret that men who detest the whole church business hav been and are swayed by these priestly lies without analyzing or tracing them to the source from whence they emanate. The masses are utterly ignorant of what Spiritualism is, except what has been told them by those who are more ignorant than they, the faithful priests, the divinely inspired of God.

As for myself, I would not exchange the glorious light of Spiritualism, the consolation, comfort, knowledge, and growth it has brought to me, for all the gold in the universe. Spiritualists no longer dread death. They know that it is only a door through which they will pass to a higher and better life. It leaves that door wide open, through which we can behold our friends living in a world as natural as this, and through which they can return and giv to us their messages of wisdom and love. Spiritualism destroys the orthodox heaven and hell, and substitutes for them what satisfies reason. Every wrong must be righted, and every good deed receive its appropriate reward. Whatever we love or hate at death this will we continue to love and hate till we hav learned the better way. The thread of life is taken up in the spirit world just where it is broken here. Those who are filthy are filthy still. The pure are pure still. Spiritual vision enables them to behold people just as they are, in all their filth or purity. Every evil deed and impure thought may be read in an open book; likewise every good deed and noble purpose. Aside from the memory of a life misspent, ought not such a hell to satisfy the morbid cravings for eternal damnation? In my judgment, by the time that some of the "whited sepulchres" that now walk this earth hav become purified and fit to look upon in spirit life, they will be glad that the hell of Spiritualism does not last through all eternity. Spiritualism teaches that every wrong deed or thought is followed by a corresponding hell, and every good deed or thought by a corresponding heaven, and that is all the heaven or hell there is here or hereafter. It teaches us that we know nothing whatever of infinity, that beyond the line which bounds the finite all is and ever will be speculation. In my judgment infinity is a myth. Matter, with its properties and possibilities, is all I can find in the universe. But I never put down stakes. All I can say is, I don't know. As far as I can learn there never has been the first item of proof given to man that there is anything but what can be comprehended under the head of finite except the abstract principles of law. The abstract is nothing, and can produce nothing. Spiritualism as I see it recognizes nothing outside of matter unless it be abstract law; therefore, if Materialists would properly investigate Spiritualism, they would find there is really no bone of contention between us unless it be future existence, and that does not, need not, conflict with their ideas of matter. There is, however, an inner principle in man which at present defies analysis, therefore it is not wise for either class to claim to know more than we do. However, whatever it is, it is something, and whether that something is matter or something else is a problem that never yet has been solved.

But the cry is, "One world at a time." "If we know we are to liv beyond the grave that is enough." "Let us eat, drink, and be merry." Stop one moment. This life is preliminary or preparatory to the next. All our thoughts and deeds will be carried with us to the next life and there exposed to the gaze of those who will look. We shall be known for just what we are. Every human being will be compelled on entering spirit life to unmask, and, if we hav been selfish, miserly, and uncharitable, if we hav done no good, if the world is no better for our having lived in it, we shall be worse than paupers. We shall be full of rottenness and cannot conceal it. If our lives here are properly spent, of course the reverse will be true. I do not seriously object, however, to the saying, "One world at a time." For those who do not hoard up riches that others ought to enjoy, who improve every opportunity to crush error and do good, it is well enough to say, "One world at a time." If we know how to liv so as to accomplish the greatest possible good to ourselves and others, then Spiritualism, so far as teaching us how to liv, is not a necessity. To them even, with all their perfect lives, spirit communion with the loved of other days, and a knowledge of another life, would be an added blessing. It would be exceedingly unwise to start on a journey to a distant country without due preparation; and yet, people who claim to be the wisest, who would giv the most careful attention to all the details of a journey here, propose to enter upon another plane of existence without a moment's forethought or preparation. How often do we hear people say, whose lives are a continued agony of regret, "It might hav been. If I had only known, how differently would I hav lived." In spirit life, we are told that the first work to be done is to right all wrongs, undo all errors and false theories, correct every evil propensity and habit, substitute charity and love for selfishness and hatred, get into harmony with truth and the spirit of progression, and then we shall be ready to take the first step forward and upward.

All men, of whatsoever name or denomination, who have made stumbling-blocks of themselves, who hav been prejudiced against and fought the truth, will then appreciate that sad refrain:

> "For of all sad words of tongue or pen,
> The saddest are these: It might hav been."

On their entrance into spirit life those who hav hoarded only riches here, who hav been deceitful, selfish, and sordid; who hav been unjust and uncharitable; who hav been trying to serve both God and the devil; who try to save their own souls at the expense of their neighbors, and who falsely claim to be Liberals, but are wolves in sheep's clothing, will wish when it is too late that they had listened to the words of wisdom, warning, and love their friends would so gladly hav given from the other shore.

People treat Spiritualism as the church treated Galileo and Servetus. They will not investigate, but insist on the right to sneer and ridicule, to talk and pass judgment on what they confess they know nothing of. Their wisdom and justice is like that of the man who would stand with his back to a railroad train that is passing and swear he does not see it; that they are humbugs, and those who do see it are cheats and fools. People very seldom learn until they are willing to be taught. We forget that we are creatures, to a very great extent, of education and circumstance. If we had been born in Turkey or Hindostan our knowledge and belief would hav been far different. We are too easily satisfied with the knowledge we hav. We, in our conceit, either imagine our knowledge to be fully demonstrated, or else we respect too highly the sources and teachers from and through which our knowledge came. We should analyze rigidly every item of our education and know positively that we are not fostering a viper of evil. Every false thing, every unreasonable hypothesis, all errors, are stumbling-blocks in the way of development and growth, and the quicker our minds are purged of all errors the better it will be for us.

People often ask, "Why do not spirits come to me, and why do not I see them and receive these proofs?" Spirits are still human beings and do not care to go where they are not wanted or well-used. When people are truthful, honest, and sincere in their desires and efforts to commune with their spirit friends, and to investigate Spiritualism, spirits will meet and aid them, and not till then. Those who receive false communications are, as a rule, not honest themselves, and the spirits know it. They do not investigate fairly. They hav resolved beforehand to crucify the truth, therefore receive a lie just as they ought. Again, all are not mediumistic. Mediumship, or susceptibility to control by spirits, is a law of mesmerism that as yet has never been satisfactorily explained. Again, those who are mediumistic must first hav it developed and strengthened by a continued application of spirit power, therefore those who ask the above questions simply betray their ignorance.

"Like attracts like," is a law that explains much of Spiritualism. It tells us how it may be a blessing or a curse. In this world people enjoy most the companionships of those who are most like themselves. The bad do not associate with the good, nor the good with the bad. The inevitable law of attraction brings those from spirit life about us who are on the same plane with ourselves. If we are good and true, then good spirits will bless and aid us. If not then the contrary will be true. We should carefully watch and analyze our impressions, and always resist if they urge to that which will tend to corrupt and degrade our manhood. A little experience of mine will serve to illustrate. Two years ago, while at work, I was suddenly seized with a strong desire for a glass of beer. I had visited a saloon a short time before. For the first time in my life I thought a glass of beer would "taste good." I at once procured a glass and drank it. The next day at about the same time I experienced the same intense thirst, and for several successive days. Finally, this intense thirst or intense desire for drink occurred several times a day, which I invariably gratified, until, becoming alarmed, I began to analyze the matter, and to search for the cause. Suddenly the idea occurred to me that some drunken spirit, or one who had not yet outgrown his appetite for strong drink, was making of me his instrument for gratifying his thirst. I asked my guides if this was true. They replied, yes; that so long as I yielded, that spirit's thirst became in part my own, and they were powerless to interfere. I immediately replied, "Tell that spirit he can never again use my organism for the gratification of his depraved appetite, and never again to seek my presence until he has learned or desires the better way." "To the pure all things are pure," is true only in the light of this infallible law of attraction.

Spiritualism is dangerous to those who are not inflexibly resolved to do right under all circumstances and at all times. Good people, especially those who understand this law, are rarely troubled by evil or low spirits. Men in this life like Washington, Lincoln, Humboldt, and Paine would hardly afford congenial companionship to such horrid monstrosities as Nero, Anthony Comstock, Judas, or any other wicked, ignorant spirit. They, as spirits, would be compelled to seek their level among the filthiest and most brutal of the land, unless they sought the better way. Comstock would doubtless be attracted to and find congenial companionship in the lowest dens and brothels of New York, where his polluted spirit could revel and feast upon the nastiness he so craves and loves in this life. His love for obscenity and perjury is most inordinate, and doubtless, when his spirit was not among the nude denizens of houses of prostitution, he would be with such judges and men as Benedict, Colgate, and Joe Cook, whose atmospheres are rendered so black and foul with perjury, dishonesty, and lies that it would be habitable for and congenial to such perjured filthy villains as Anthony Comstock. Yes, even in Spiritualism there is a place for such men as he, but even he may learn to prefer light to darkness, and when he does a helping hand will invariably be outstretched to aid and guide him. There never was an honest prayer made for light and growth, for a purer, better, nobler manhood, but that the bright spirits from the wisdom-spheres strove to their utmost to answer it. In spirit life there are two grand occupations—first, acquiring knowledge; second, dispensing charity, helping their neighbors, binding up their wounds, leading the fallen, depraved, and ignorant up out of darkness into light. In one respect the next world will be gloriously unlike this. The prayers of the suffering and needy are always heard and answered. There we shall learn the lesson, if we do not here, that "it is more blessed to giv than to receive."

If this is true, that the evil are attracted to the evil, and the good to the pure, how important that Spiritualism be thoroughly understood. In my judgment every man, woman, and child in the land should throw open their spiritual doors to the spirit world, and by pure lives invite the companionship and communion of wise and good spirits, that they may be taught the laws and philosophy of a progressive and harmonious life.

There is not a house in all the land but the wise and good in spirit life would be glad to enter with their proofs of immortality and lessons of wisdom, if only the bars of ignorance and bigotry could be removed.

[CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.]

Age of Chrishna and Buddha.—Concluded.

A learned Brahman remarked to Seeley that "it was impossible for man to do these works." Lieut.-Col. Fitzclarence, in his public dispatches, remarked of these temples: "My eyes and mind are absolutely satiated with these wonders; wearied by objects so gigantic and extraordinary; crowded and overwhelmed with ideas so overpowering and various that I despair of ever forming a calm judgment. The gross superstition, the cause of their formation, becomes venerable and respectable. Everything around me spoke of other times and nations and arts long since passed away. I look in vain for any class of men great, or, I may say, omnipotent enough to venture on such prodigious undertakings. I hav sought in vain for any incident in the lapse of time to giv an equal conception of man's power over matter."

Says Seeley again: "One's mind is so bewildered at beholding these stupendous and immortal works. . . . I do not think there are five square inches of the walls left undecorated as minutely as it is perfectly done. . . . It really seems impossible that man could hav done such work out of such hard and stubborn material, and finished tastefully or delicately or massively as the taste or fancy of the artists dictated."

Here I must cease to quote. The honest, but—through his Christian prejudice—silly writer concludes in one place that these temples were excavated less than a thousand years ago, yet finished his account by admitting they "were made by a people of whom we hav even no tradition." No tradition a thousand years ago! And he virtually admits the correctness of an architect's calculations as to a like temple, one at Salsette, that it would require forty thousand men for forty years to finish it. Seeing that but one or two workmen could be employed in the start, and that only as the excavations grew could more be employed, these doubtless were some ages in completing.

One fact has never been commented on so far as I hav observed. At the temple called Doomar Linga, as at most of the others, is a reservoir hollowed out of the rock. This reservoir is at the south entrance and reached by thirty steps originally, and supplied by water falling about one hundred feet during the rainy sason. "These steps do not reach one-third of the way because the waterfall has washed the rock over sixty steps deeper." Query, How long would it take this water, falling about one hundred feet to wear the hard granite of the reservoir there sixty feet deeper? This told, we may hav some idea as to when this temple was completed. I consider this a most important fact.

This water falls only during the rainy season. If we allow but seven inches for each step here are four hundred and twenty inches washed away, or thirty-five feet. At the other temples the reservoirs are supplied in various ways, the steps, where necessary leading to the verge of the reservoirs. In some cases cisterns are hollowed out on the floors of the areas or temples. Here it is plain, beyond doubt, that once the last step touched the rim of the reservoir. But the water falling originally very nearly one hundred feet on this solid granite, described as so hard that no instrument known during the last century could cut it, has actually worn it down over sixty steps. Why do we hear so little about this place to-day? and why was so much disclosed eighty years ago? Simply because the evidences against the truth of the Bible story hav become so strong during the past year that a full description of Ellora would strike with positive conviction all ordinary readers. Then their pious souls innocently disclosed the facts. How politic is priestcraft. Silence is now their mightiest weapon, else how they would charge it upon Ingersoll that he got all his mistakes of Moses from the good Bishop Colenso of the church of England. But, good heavens! what a boomerang would that be. Forever be that name, Colenso, suppressed! What would all the good little Sunday-school children think if told that the awful, horrid Bob Ingersoll is merely using the arguments of one who is yet a venerable bishop of the most orthodox of churches?

In conclusion, let me add that the orthodox Spinetto, who lectured so ably during the latter part of last century upon the "Hieroglyphics of Egypt," showed beyond the shadow of a doubt that as far back as the date assigned in our Bible chronology as of Adam's creation, Egypt must hav been densely peopled by a race as highly civilized as any that has ever existed. He, good man, begged and plead with the churchmen to adopt his views, assuring them that the time must come when even the school children will laugh at them. Alas! He was more of a scientist than theologian—versed better in hieroglyphics than scriptures. Why did they not adopt his chronology? Simply because the flood was a new creation. No matter when "God, having used up all the nothing there was, had to make Eve out of a rib," there was the deluge, its exact date fixed, and all the remains and ruins in the world can't go back of that. The flood, a new creation, with the Noah family as the progenitors of the human race—no going back of that. So that whatever pretended to be older than that—older than about forty-four hundred years—was out of the question; a direct flying in the very face of Providence. Even rainbows must lower their arches.

If our friends will turn to Huc's "Chinese Empire," Volume II, they will find the good Jesuit priest, whose work is the fairest, most interesting one ever published on China, givs an account of the birth and ministry of Buddha. He says he was born over nine hundred years before Christ, of the virgin Maia, who had been espoused to a chief of the house of Chakia, but the marriage was not consummated, for she became with child by the spirit of Brahma. This had been predicted ages before. The womb of the virgin became clear as crystal, so that the holy child could be seen prior to its birth, and was seen by many, who testified to the fact.

Now here we hav something. This is no mere old man's dream, you see. Here is just what has ever been lacking in Matthew & Co.'s account to convince us. Granted the miraculous conception and birth, all the rest follows. But the premise must be clear—clear as crystal, as in this case. How can we, who trust not our own dreams, trust in the venerable Joseph's? CLARK IRVINE.

Liberal League Notes.

ELMINA SLENKER writes from Snowville, Va.: "I think in a few months we shall be able to get up a Liberal League here if the people keep on reading and investigating as they are now doing. I presume thee will be at the Bennett Reception. I can only go in thought, but my heart will be with you rejoicing in the freedom of our brave champion."

MR. JOHN BASSETT BEEL, of Kingston, Ont., Can., one of the truest Liberals in America, writes under date of April 28th: "I am thinking of moving with my family to some of the states as soon as I can get settled up with the insurance company for the loss I sustained on my buildings just burned. I will hav a few hundred dollars in cash. What do you think of Texas as a state in which to settle? I hav some notion of going there. As a brother Liberal I ask your advice." I hope our Liberal friends in various parts of the country will correspond with Bro. Beel and giv him the information he desires.

BRO. WILLIS MCDANNALD, of Walla Walla, Or., writes: "I send this day to Prof. Rawson an order for a charter for an Auxiliary Liberal League signed by eleven good and worthy citizens. By the time the charter arrives we will hav at least twenty, perhaps more. If we could only secure a good speaker and organize we could soon hav our state well represented in the League movement. I shall continue to labor for the cause to the best of my ability. I reside in Oregon, near the state line between our state and Washington territory. The territory of Washington has a good Constitution taxing church property and ministers. I wish to make a move in the same direction by the time our Legislature meets. The Liberals of this country must be united and fight to the death."

BRO. M. REIMAN, of New York city, in a private letter in which he sends me a liberal remittance, writes: "Our country needs thousands of Liberal Leagues in order to save it from bigotry, corruption, persecution, destruction, and priestcraft, and replace the country as it was left to us by Washington, Jefferson, and Paine. Until Liberals form a political party they will in vain look for equality, justice, respect, or protection. When Liberalism gains political power everywhere the gallows will be abolished, the prison and the church will be converted into asylums and halls of learning. Poverty, crime, superstition, saints, angels, and gods will fly out through the church windows never to return again. Mankind will then free themselves from those lazy, corrupt, deceitful, ambitious drones in the hire of humanity, known as priests and crowned heads, and justice, brotherhood, liberty, education, and prosperity will be the result. Such noble results are well worth working for." H. L. GREEN.

Welcome and Installation.

FURTHER HONORS TO THE EDITOR OF "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

Though one of the grandest and most enthusiastic receptions ever bestowed upon mortal man was given to D. M. Bennett upon his emerging from prison—on which occasion Chickering Hall could not contain more than half the people who turned out to do him honor—it has been supplemented by another which, if less magnificent in point of numbers, was certainly as enjoyable to all who attended it. The Fourth New York Liberal League decided, some four weeks ago, to giv a private reception to the returned convict, whom, during his imprisonment, they had elected as their President, and to duly install him in the office. At a meeting of the League held April 18th it was voted to giv this private reception to Mr. Bennett on the evening of Saturday, May 8th, and Mr. Henry J. Thomas, Dr. Charles L. Andrews, and George E. Macdonald were appointed a committee to perfect the arrangements for the meeting. On the evening of the 8th it came off at the capacious and magnificent parlors of Mrs. E. L. Fernandez, No. 201 Second avenue. The greater part of the members of the Fourth New York League were present, with many invited guests. About seventy-five persons were present, and by common consent they passed one of the most pleasant evenings of their lives.

At or before eight o'clock the friends began to gather in, and the greetings were cordial and hearty. Cheerful conversation was held by the numerous little groups throughout the rooms. At nine o'clock Vice-President Henry A. Stone called the meeting to order, and read the following letter from E B. Foote, Sr., M.D., who found himself unable to be present on this occasion :

120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, May 8, 1880.

HENRY A STONE, ESQ., My Dear Sir : I regret that a prior engagement prevents me from accepting your kind invitation to be present at the private reception your League proposes to giv to your honored President, D. M. Bennett, at the residence of Mrs. Fernandez, this evening. You are indeed favored above all others of the auxiliary Leagues in having for a presiding officer one who has been baptized in persecution and imprisonment for having bravely defended the cause of free thought, free speech, free press, and free mails. I trust you will find the hand of your worthy President warm with the repeated shakings it has received from his enthusiastic supporters since the Grand Reception at Chickering Hall. It was my great pleasure to be one of a sub-committee, appointed by the Reception Committee, to visit the Albany Penitentiary on the memorable morning of April 29th, and to grasp the honest hand of the veteran editor as he emerged from the grim door of the prison. Giv it an extra shake for me on this auspicious occasion, when he is to resume his long-vacant chair as the presiding officer of your League, and at the same time pay my warm regards to your hospitable hostess, Mrs. Fernandez.

Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE, Sr., M.D.

Mr. Stone then read the following brief address :

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN, FRIENDS OF TRUTH, LIBERTY, AND JUSTICE : It is with great pleasure that I meet you here and speak of the objects which hav drawn us together. It is to giv utterance and manifestation, in some degree, to those irrepressible and sublime feelings and inspirations that hav been awakened within us and perfected to fruition by viewing and feeling the noble manhood, the unfaltering integrity, the grand, glorious, and unswerving patriotism, which hav characterized and illumined, yes, crowned with never fading laurels, our gallant and triumphant standard-bearer, Mr. D. M. Bennett ; to extend to him a hearty welcome and friendly greeting in whose friendship we glory, whose ardor and independence we honor and admire, some outward token, though feeble it may be, of that deep, strong, and burning enthusiasm which permeates and thrills our noblest manhood. As an exponent of truth, liberty, and right, he returns to us, a living martyr in the grandest of all causes, that of downtrodden humanity.

"Through personal malice, sectarian intolerance and bigotry, superstition's blind and damning perfidy, has he been made a victim to one of the most malicious, black-hearted, and diabolical human fiends that ever disgraced humanity's record.

"Had such a monstrosity existed, and even been tolerated, centuries back, in the semi-barbarous conditions of society, it would hav been somewhat excusable ; but in the ninth decade of the nineteenth century, in our boasted land of American freedom, that such a loathsome and contemptible abortion of the genus homo should hav his liberty and remain unpunished is much more complimentary to his shrewdness than to our patriotism or manhood ; and how little there is of the blood of our grand old Revolutionary sires now flowing in the veins of the average American !

"Through the long weary months of our friend's incarceration I need not remind you of the sympathy and condolence that gushed forth spontaneously from the grand and noble hearts of our intelligent, liberty-loving, humanity-serving people throughout the length and breadth of this great land. Grosser injustice could hardly be inflicted than that our honored friend has suffered. But, my friends, there are two sides at least to every problem. As much as we hav reason to deplore this great injustice, it nevertheless shall stand forth in ages to come as the milestone which shall point to the changing of the tide, the restoration of those dearest and most sacred rights, human liberty and justice.

"As much as we hav reason to loathe and despise Anthony Comstock, yet the fact is too palpable to require demonstration that he of all other men has done far the most to strengthen the Liberal cause and awaken the people from that state of lethargy into which we hav fallen to an appreciation of our rights and the grandeur of the possibilities even now awaiting our grasp. While we hav no thanks to render nor honor to accord to him for this unintentional service he has rendered us as a people, yet most sincerely do we congratulate our friend Mr. Bennett that he has survived the ordeal and become thereby the unrivaled champion of our cause, of the people's cause, of humanity's cause.

"Perhaps it were better not to allude to the assaults, the dying screeches, of those carrion birds who hav thereby ended their own ignoble lives. Be that as it may, we will hav the compassion to believe that their folly is attributable to the diseased and chaotic condition of their inferior brains; that they really fancied they had found the trail or caught the scent of some fetid morsel with which to gorge their morbid and depraved appetites. Like the venomous reptile that bites the hand that givs it food, they hav sought to murder their truest, best friends, hav sunk themselves in infamy, with none to chant their final requiem. Our worthy friend Mr. Bennett has no reason to fear their slanderous assault. It is human to err ; and if he has shown himself to be human by erring in some trivial and minor particulars, let us all remember that beautiful lesson—none the worse for being sifted from among the chaff of those so called inspired writings—of the woman taken in adultery. As that wild, brutish rabble clamored for her life, as they claimed, for the vindication of the law, the humane man knelt and wrote in the sand, 'Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone.' Let us heed and apply the moral.

"Our duty is plain and undisguised; whenever and wherever the sneaking and treacherous assassin or the defiant and heartless tyrant dares trespass upon our rights or the rights of any citizen, however humble, then should we rise in the dignity of our manhood, the justice of our claims, and the righteousness of our cause—rise en masse, stay the hand of the oppressor, and rescue the oppressed :

"'The night is fast waning,
The morn begins to dawn ;
The light of truth 's proclaiming
The majesty of man.

Throw out your starry banners !
Peel forth the glad refrain,
Humanity's triumphant,
And Reason now shall reign.'

"Let us fearlessly pursue our onward march, battling for the right, 'with charity for all and malice toward none.' Let us adopt once for all this grand and noble motto, worthy to be emblazoned in letters of gold on heaven's high firmament, 'The world is my country ; to do good, my religion.' Then in the fulness of time shall truth, right, and humanity triumph; then shall all the peoples in all the earth be glad ; then shall we in truth realize the consummation of that good time predicted by the prophet, 'when nation shall cease to war against nation, neither shall they learn war any more ; when the sword shall be beaten into plowshares, and the spear into pruning hooks.' Then may every man sit under his own vine and fig-tree, and 'none shall molest him nor make him afraid.'

"My friends, let us now for a short time imagine that we hav attained this millennium. Let us for the time being dispel the burdens and perplexities of life, and revel in those social and ennobling pleasures which shall mark this as an oasis in life's journey. And now, my friends, I hav the pleasure of introducing to you, and congratulating in behalf of the League, him whom we hav elected to grace our League as its honored and worthy President. My last and greatest pleasure of the evening is in now congratulating our President and asking him to assume the chair and preside over this meeting."

The address was indorsed and the welcome seconded by a hearty clapping of hands and other demonstrations of joy and good feeling.

In response Mr. Bennett spoke substantially as follows :

MEMBERS OF THE FOURTH NEW YORK LIBERAL LEAGUE, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN : In the sincerity of my heart I thank you for the kind and enthusiastic welcome you hav given me. I thank you for the sympathy and friendship you hav extended to me. I prize your esteem, your appreciation, and your love. I could not ask for more agreeable companions in the struggle we are making in the cause of truth. I could not ask for more kind and appreciative friends. I assure you the change is great through which I have passed within the last ten days. Ten days ago I was behind the bars of a cheerless, gloomy prison, and locks and bolts restrained me from the enjoyment of the liberty dear to every human being, and surrounded by felons of all grades, while to-night I find myself here in this splendid mansion with the kindest friends around me a man ever had. I thank you with the truest and most fervent sentiments of my heart.

I deem it a great honor to be elected to the position of President of an auxiliary League, but among the nearly two hundred Leagues now scattered over this broad land, were I proffered a choice as to which I should preside over, I would giv the Fourth Liberal League of New York city the preference before all others. I am acquainted with all its members, and know them to be fast and true friends. I hav been familiar with the League from its incipiency. I am well acquainted with the circumstances under which it came into existence, and am well apprised of the efforts it has made in the path of progress. I hav enjoyed many pleasant meetings with you, and hope to enjoy many more. This League may with propriety be called THE TRUTH SEEKER LEAGUE It was organized in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and the attachés of THE TRUTH SEEKER first enrolled themselves as members of it, to which enthusiastic body other kind and earnest friends joined. I feel proud to be your presiding officer. I feel proud of the honor you conferred upon me by electing me your President while still immured within the walls of a prison. This is probably the only League in the country which has a returned convict for a presiding officer, who was elected while numbered among thieves, burglars, forgers, counterfeiters, robbers, and murderers.

I anticipate many pleasant meetings with you in the future. I highly approve of these social gatherings which bring us together, which help us to become better acquainted with each other, which increase and ripen our friendship, and cheer us on in the journey of life. It is our privilege and right to obtain from existence all the happiness and pleasure possible. The more good deeds we perform towards each other, the more kind words we speak to each other, the more we increase our own happiness. It is not within our power to do aught to assist or injure deity, if there is one, but it is quite within our ability to aid or injure each other. Let us resolve, then, to help each other all we can—to do all we can to make life pleasant to each other. Let us meet often together as we meet to-night, in a social and informal manner, and let us strengthen the ties which bind us together. The social phase of life is the one in which we find the most true enjoyment, and which contributes most to our happiness, and makes existence pleasant. Let us be more social. Let us gather often together, and in the free spirit of friendship and equality blend cheerfully and happily together. Let us do away with formal and staid ceremonies, and to the extent of our abilities teach our fellow-beings the means of obtaining happiness here and now. It is far better to be cheerful and happy in our present existence than to pass our lives in long-faced gloom and sadness, with a view to increasing our happiness in a future state of existence. If we secure happiness now, we will be sure of it, and it will place us in a condition to be happy in coming time if a future state of existence is our good fortune. The old adage that "a bird in the hand is better than two in the bush," is very applicable to the subject of happiness. To make sure of it now is far better than to defer it to some unknown time in an unknown world.

I believe, as has been remarked by Bro. Stone, that the efforts of our enemies will contribute to our good, and to the advancement of our cause. Instead of being crushed and thrown backward by the persecutions of our foes we hav risen in power and hav advanced in the cause of truth and human progress. What was meant for our ill has resulted in our good, and so may it ever be. Let us be prepared to take advantage of the conditions of life that may be open before us, and make all our experiences contribute to our happiness and welfare. Let us enjoy life all we can, and help our fellows to do the same. My friends, I sincerely thank you.

A motion was made, seconded, and passed that a business meeting of the League be held on the evening of the 16th, and that another social meeting of the nature of this be held subject to the call of the President. The League then adjourned and resolved itself into a social meeting, in which all present were participants.

Mrs. Rachel Andrews advanced towards Mr. Bennett, bearing a large and beautiful boquet of fragrant flowers, young buds, etc., and presented the same to him in the name of the young ladies of the S. P. Andrews' Alwato class, for which thanks were duly returned.

The beautiful, original welcome song by Mrs. Jennie B. Brown and E. A. Booth, was then artistically sung by Mrs. Virginia Macdonald, Miss Ida Moore, Mr. Farrington, and Mr. Lockhart; Mr. E. A. Booth, musical director, accompanying the same on the piano.

Dr. J. Archie Joseph next recited the humorous sketch entitled "The Quack Doctor," which he said he listened to a few days ago on Eighth avenue, as follows :

THE QUACK DOCTOR.

Scene.—An itinerant peddler of medicine surrounded by a crowd—two little boys and one girl.

Ladies and Gentlemen : I'm Doctor Von Blutersbourg, late from the Emporium of the Universe. I hav just arrived in this 'ere country and will sell my medicines and giv my advice gratis for the benefit of my fellow-sufferers. I am the seventh son of a seventh son, hav traveled from the sun's oriental delineation to its occidental delineation, educated and brought up in seventeen universities in distant countries, and hav at last been prevailed upon by the inhabitants of this 'ere place to appear before you in the capacity of a physician.

Ladies and Gentlemen: I was the physician to the great and mighty "Kow Kaw," the hemperor of all the "Chinas." I was converted to Christianity during the embassy of the late Lord Elgin, and left that there country to come to this 'ere, which may be considered the greatest blessing that has ever 'appened to mankind. I hav brought with me the following unparalleled, inestimable, and never-to-be-matched medicines, the fust of which is called "Parry Ransicum Wham Sicome," from the island of Waudy Wha Whang, one drop of which, poured over yer gums, should you 'av 'aprehed to lose your teeth, will cause a new set to sprout out like mushrooms from a 'ot bed. If any lady 'ere present suffers from that 'ere peculiar redundant exuberant called beard, it will, on three applications, reduce it better than the great Melchie razor stroke itself.

Ladies and Gentlemen: I am also very good at the cure of the eyes. For example: The last hemperor of Hokitiki was suffe ing from a cataract. I not only very dexterously took out 'is majesty's visions, but, after anointing the sockets with a peculiar glutinous application, I put in 'is majesty's 'ead two hi's taken from the 'ead of a living lion. I not only gave the hemperor back 'is light, for which 'e paid me by hexiling me from 'is hempire, but made 'im hawful to ell 'is admirers and beholders. I beg leave to say I 'as by me different hi's from different hanimals to suit all your faces and professions. (Takes bottle in hand.) Ladies and Gentlemen: This 'ere bottle which I 'old in my 'and contains the grand Eliptical Asiatical Panticurical Nervous Cordial, warranted to completely cure and eradicate all diseases incidental to humanity. But I don't like to speak of myself. The man who speaks of 'imself his a hagotist; but this I will venture to say, not only am I the greatest hastronomer, philosopher, and physician of the age, but I am the greatest genius that hever hilluminated mankind; and if you could only read of the wonderful cures effected by the grand Eliptical Asiatical Panticurical Nervous Cordial, warranted to completely cure—eradicate all diseases incidental to humanity, I am sure none of you would be so foolish as to get sick. With your permission I'll read one or two.

'SIR: I was cut in halves in a saw-pit. Cured in a quarter of a bottle. J. A. J."

"BROOKLYN, April 30, 1875.

"SIR: I was, for seventy-one years and two days, a martyr to most acute cholera. Hearing of your infallible remedy, I was induced to ask my druggist if he kept the 'panacea.' On being replied in the affirmative, and having a bottle placed in my hands, I felt an immediate shock go into my system and the cholera go out. Havn't suffered since. Make any use of this testimonial you please, and send me a five-cent bottle of the medicine, as it is handy to hav by one. ANDREW E. MEYERS."

Now comes the best of all.

"STAPLETON, S. I., August 33, 1878.

"SIR: Venturing too near a powder magazine at Staten Island, I was, by a sudden explosion, blown into a thousand atoms; and, sir, by this unpleasant accident, I was rendered unfit for my business (a banker's clerk); but hearing tell of your 'Grand Eliptical Asiatical Panticurical Nervous Cordial,' I made essay thereof. The first bottle united my strayed particles, the second animated my shattered nerves, the third recruited my health, and the fourth sent me back to Broad street to count my dollars, make out bills of acceptance and accouut—the most wonderful cure effected by the 'Grand Eliptical Asiatical Panticurical Nervous Cordial,' that cures all diseases incidental to humanity. Yours to command, ROGER SELIGMAN."

Before I go I would state if any one 'ere suffers from a cough, a cold, tightness in the chest, inflammation in the lungs, consumption, rheumatics, gout, pains across the back or in the 'ead, fever, sore throat, hasthma, toothache, catarrh, lumbago, or diarrhœa, try my remedy. Five cents a bottle, six bottles for a quarter or the case permanently undertaken for a dollar.

Look out, here comes Tony!

Applause and laughter followed.

Mrs. Virginia Macdonald then gave a beautiful solo, Mr. Booth accompanying her with piano music. Upon encoring her, she rendered most beautifully, "Swanee River," the company joining in the chorus. She is a most excellent singer.

A portion of the company, to the extent of three or four sets, joined in the dance, Mr. Booth furnishing the music on the piano, followed by waltzing by several couples.

After this ice-cream and cake were served, accompanied by a fine article of light mountain wine of California. Conversations, cheerful chatting, anecdote-telling, etc., etc., made the time pass pleasantly away.

The popular humorist, W. S. Andrews, then gave as a recitation "The Funeral of Buck Fanshaw in the Mining Regions." It was received with applause and manifestations of pleasure.

Miss Belle Bennett sang a beautiful solo, playing also on the piano.

More dancing was indulged in—the lanciers, waltzing, etc. Everybody was happy.

Dr. J. Archie Joseph gave as a recitation, "Betsey and I are Out." It was well rendered.

Mr. Gorsuch recited a somewhat serious poem.

Mrs. Gorsuch followed with "The Pride of Battery B."

W. S. Andrews then gave in inimitable style "Leadville Piety," as follows:

I was standing in front of the hotel when my attention was attracted by a dilapidated, antiquated-looking specimen of a saloon bummer, who was passing along the street ringing a bell. At intervals he would cease ringing and shout: "Religious racket right away at the big tent! Roll up, tumble up, or slide up on yer y-ear, for we'll hav a bang-up dish o' gospel talk from Faro Bill, and d-o-o-o-n't you forget it."

Turning to a dapper little gambler who stood near, I asked,

"Who is this Faro Bill?"

"Who is he? Well, now, if that ain't the boss play for high. You kin break me right here if I thought there was a bloke in the mines that didn't know Bill. He used to be one o' the boys, but got capped into a religious game by a slick-tongued gospel sharp about two months ago. He's chopped on all his old rackets, and don't stand in with nothin' that don't show up a Bible or a prayer book in the lay-out. Billy used to be the boss gambler of the camp, and warn't afared to sit in a game with the flyest sport that ever slung a card; but he's clean gone on the pious lay now, and seems to hav lost all the good there was in him. The boss mouth-piece of the heaverdy mill has gone down to Denver, an' Bill is a goin' to stand in an' sling gospel to the boys as well as he can."

This explanation, given in the most earnest tone, started me instanter for the big tent. It was used at night for a variety theater, where "artists" of questionable character performed acts of still more questionable decency, and was rented for religious services every Sunday morning. I found the tent filled to its utmost capacity. Many had, no doubt, come through curiosity to see how Bill would depart himself in this, his initial sermon. Upon the stage sat a burly, red-faced man, with arms folded in a careless manner, who looked over the large audience with an air of the most decided independence. This was Faro Bill, the speaker of the occasion. When he arose he glanced around the tent for a moment, evidently collecting his thoughts, and began:

"Feller citizens: The preacher bein' absent, it falls on me to take his hand and play it fur all it's worth. You all know that I'm just learnin' the game, an' of course I may be expected to make wild breaks, but I don't believe there's a rooster in the camp mean enough to take advantage o' my ignorance an' cold deck me right on the first deal. I'm sincere in this new departure, an' I believe I've struck a game that I can play clear through without copperin' a bet, fur when a man tackles a lay-out like this he plays every card to win, an' if he goes through the deal as he orter do, when he lays down to die, and the last card is ready to slide from the box, he can call the turn every time.

"I was readin' in the Bible to-day that yarn about the prodigal son. an' I want to tell yer the story. The book don't giv no dates, but it happened long, long ago. This prodigal son had an old man that put up the coin every time the kid struck him for a stake, an' never kicked at the size of the pile either. I reckon the old man was purty well fixed, an' when he died he intended to giv all his wealth to this kid an' his brothers. Prod gives the old man a little game o' talk one day, an' induced him to whack in advance o' the death racket. He no sooner got his divvy in his fist than he shook the old man an' struck out to take in some o' the other camps. He had a way-up time for a while an' slung his cash to the front like he owned the best payin' lead on airth; but hard luck hit him a lick at last an' left him flat. The book don't state what he went broke on, but I recken he got steered up agin some brace game. But, anyhow, he got left without a chip or a four-bit piece to go an' ante on. An old granger then tuk him home an' set him to herdin' hogs, an' here he got so hard up an' hungry that he piped off the swine while they were feedin', an' he stood in with 'em on a husk lunch. He soon weakened on such plain provender an' says to himself, says he: 'Even the old man's hired hands are livin' on square grub while I'm worryin' along here on corn husks straight. I'll jist take a grand tumble to myself an' chop on this racket at once. I'll skip back to the governor an' try to fix things up, an' call for a new deal,' so off he started.

"The old man seed the kid a comin'an' what do ye reckon he done? Did he pull his gun an' lay for him, intendin' to wipe him as soon as he got into range? Did he call the dogs to chase him off the ranche? Did he rustle around for a club an' giv him a stand off at the front gate? Eh? Not to any alarming extent he didn't. No, sir. The scripture book says he walzed out to meet him, an' froze to him on the spot, an' kissed him, an' marched him off to a clothing store an' fitted him out in the nobbiest rig to be had for coin. Then the old gent invited all the neighbors an' killed a fat calf, an' giv the biggest blow-out the camp had ever seen."

At the conclusion of the narrative the speaker paused, evidently framing in his mind a proper application of the story. Before he could resume, a tall, blear-eyed gambler, with a fierce mustache, arose and said:

"Taint me as would try ter break up a meetin, or do anythin' disreligious. No, sir. I'm not that sort of a citizen. But in all public hoc-doos it is a parliamentary rule fur enybody as wants to ax questions to rise up and fire them off. I don't want ter fool away time a questionin' the workin's of religion; oh, no. As long as it is kept in proper bounds, an' does not interfere with the boys in their games, I don't see as it can do harm. I just want ter ax the honorable speaker if he has not giv himself dead away? Does it stand to reason that a bloke would feed upon corn an' husks, when there was hash factories in the camp? Would enebody hev refused him the price of a square meal if he had struck them fur it? Would eny of the dealers who beat him out of his coin see him starve? As I remarked afore, I don't want ter make eny disrespectable breaks, but I must say that I hav got it put up that the speaker has been a tryin' ter feed us on cussed thin taffy, an' no one but a silly would take it in."

Bill glared upon the speaker and fairly hissed:

"Do you mean to say that I am a liar?"

"Wal, you can take it just as you choose. Some folks would swallow it in that shape."

Bill pulled his revolver, and in an instant the bright barrels of numerous weapons flashed in the air as the friends of each party prepared for active duty. The brevet preacher was the first to fire, and the rash doubter of spiritual truth fell dead on the ground. Shot followed shot in quick succession and when quiet was again restored a score or more of dead and wounded were carried from the tent. Having secured attention, Bill said:

"Further proceedings is adjourned for the day. You will receive the doxology."

The audience arose.

"May grace, mercy, and peace be with you, now and forever, Amen; an' I want it distinctly understood that I am going ter maintain a proper respect for the gospel if I hav ter croak every dirty son-of-a-gun in the mines. Meetin' is out."

Mr. Andrews was loudly applauded.

A vote of thanks was heartily rendered to the hostess, Mrs. Fernandez, who with such marked grace and dignity had dispensed the entertainments of the evening. Three cheers were also given her with a hearty good will.

After many congratulations, hand-shakings, etc., the company quietly wended their way homeward, wishing the return of many similar meetings. The ex convict, as he returned to his home, thought this far to be preferred to prison life.

The arrangements made by the committee were perfect, and they acquitted themselves throughout in the most creditable manner.

Among those present were Prof. A. L. Rawson, T. C. Leland, S. P. Andrews, Dr. J. R. Buchanan, Dr. C. S. Weeks, Mr. John Bentley and daughter, Mrs. Andrews, Mrs. Varni, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, Mrs. E. H. Bennett and daughter, Mrs. C. A. N Smith, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Somerby, Messrs. Williams and Dixon from Orange, N. J., W. P. Slensby, the Misses Briggs, Miss Lorenze, Dr. Charles L Andrews and wife, Flora and Josie Tilton, and numerous others, old and young, presenting altogether an array of youth and beauty and culture and intellect such as is seldom seen. The hour of [illegible] had arrived when we left for our homes, all feeling that we had passed a very enjoyable evening.

Personal.

I hoped when I left the prison at Albany that I would hav no occasion to further notice the most unkind attacks that were made upon me while an occupant of a lonely cell, but I had no sooner emerged from the prison walls than the vilest and most cowardly course was again resorted to, to deeply injure me, not only with my dearest friends but with the public at large. On the evening of the 2d inst., at Chickering Hall, when the ovation was being extended to me, of which any conquering hero returning from a victorious campaign, or any monarch beloved by his people, might well be proud, cowardly foes were secretly circulating anonymous scurrilous pamphlets, with a view to counteracting the efforts of friends and wounding me most deeply. Thousands of those circulars were distributed at the entrance to the Hall, and were thrown around most profusely. Had it been printed on the first page, "This was gotten up by a cowardly, unprincipled villain, who had not the courage or manliness to openly attack an enemy, and by one who resorts to the methods of a sneak and an assassin." it could not hav spoken the truth any more plainly than it did. It is a mode of warfare that no gentleman, no man of honor, none but a dirty, unprincipled villain, would engage in.

The Hon. Elizur Wright in a letter to me respecting the contemptible affair says:

BOSTON, May 11, 1880.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: I agree with you as to the unspeakable meanness of that anonymous pamphlet, and am rather consoled by coming to the conclusion that a black-hearted theological enemy, and not an injudicious Infidel friend did it. It is the natural fruit of the "Society for the Suppression of Vice." By the way, a society of that name was gotten up in the church of England about the beginning of this century, and flourished perniciously till Bro. Sidney Smith gave it its coup de grace in the Edinburgh Review in 1809 You will find his essay upon it in his published works, and I think THE TRUTH SEEKER would do well to reprint it. Yours truly, ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Still, I would hav taken no notice of it had I not learned that the same scurrilous pamphlet had also been sent all over the country, to my best friends and patrons as well as to the press of the country. The vile scoundrel, or scoundrels, who engaged in this despicable business seem actuated by a motive to do me the greatest amount of injury possible; and yet they had not manliness enough to put their names to the vile thing issued. It would seem that more than one person was engaged in getting them up and circulating them. It is believed, by the type upon which they were printed, and the extracts made from various Chicago papers, writers for Bundy's Journal, etc., that they were gotten up in the Religio Philosophical Journal office. The conductor of that slanderous sheet has shown himself capable of and partial to that kind of dirty, shameless, ignominious warfare. Some were mailed from that city, some were mailed from this city, and some from Boston. It is believed that Bundy, Comstock, Ellis, and Abbot justly share in the ignominy and disgrace of printing and circulating the vile pamphlet. The language interspersed through it bespeaks the handiwork of Ellis. The names of friends and patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER were doubtless obtained from that stolen list, which names were in possession of Abbot. Comstock is credited with hiring boys to circulate the vile trash at the great meeting at Chickering Hall on Sunday night. I cannot think that B. F. Underwood lent himself to so low and base a piece of villainy, but that he was one of the men who authorized the publication of my private letters last fall with the view of crushing me and destroying my influence is unfortunately most clearly proved; and he is still writing to my best friends, approving of the course of Abbot and Bundy toward me, and bitterly condemning me.

In the dirty little pamphlet alluded to are extracts from two of those unfortunate letters which my enemies are so fond of holding up to the public, and which seem to require a word of explanation. Let it be remembered, then, that the writing of those letters ran over a period of several months. At first I thought the person to whom they were written was a friend, and a respectable woman, but I ultimately learned my mistake. The two letters from which the extracts are given were written after the truth dawned upon me. The first extract contains improper words, but they were the language of the woman herself, and which, to meet a charge of "vulgarity," I repeated, and which, instead of charging upon her direct, I ironically took to myself and begged her pardon for using. It was she who had used the language, and I knew I would hav but to repeat it in that way to bring it to her memory. That was the sole object of my writing thus. The second extract is from the last letter I wrote her, and after I had learned her disreputable character and the practice of promiscuity in which she had been indulging, and after she had reported all manner of falsehoods about me. I can only say that if the language was harsh, objectionable, and indecent, the circumstances which called it out justified it. And if it was wrong to write it for the eyes of the one person interested, it is certainly most culpable to spread it before the eyes of tens of thousands who hav not the slightest business with it.

It is an unpleasant subject to speak of. I hav deeply regretted writing those letters, and it would seem I had sufficiently acknowledged my thoughtless conduct, and that my friends had sufficiently overlooked the indiscretion, but there are some facts connected with the matter which should be better understood; and if my readers will pardon this allusion I will promise not to refer to the subject again unless I am forced to it. Let me, then, giv these facts in as brief language as possible:

1. More than two years ago I wrote several letters to a

Convention of Michigan Spiritualists and Liberalists at Battle Creek.—Concluded.

Mr. Babcock generously added five dollars to the fund raised the previous evening for the picture. Others contributed till the amount raised reached to fifty-four dollars. Mr. Beals sang a very beautiful song suited to the occasion —"I Liv for Those Who Love Me."

The Mutual Benefit Association was next presented. G. H. Geer spoke in behalf of the Association, stating its objects and aims. terms of membership, etc, and was followed by J. H. Burnham, who, in his usual earnest manner, made a strong appeal to the friends to come forward. Do not stand back and say, "I will wait and see if it is going to be a success," but come forward and join now, pay in your money, and, by so doing, make it a success. L. S. Burdick, A. Heyser, and M. J. Matthews, each made short speeches in behalf of the same, and considerable interest was aroused. The annual meeting of said Association, for the election of officers and other business, was appointed to be held at Stuart's Hall, at two o'clock, this Saturday afternoon.

Convention adjourned to meet at two o'clock.

Saturday afternoon session.—Convention called to order by L. S. Burdick. Song by Bishop Beals—"The Beautiful Hills." Dr. S. A. Thomas, of Sturgis, was the first speaker for the afternoon. He took for his subject, "Freedom of thought is the gem of liberty." He spoke of Moses and Jesus, who, he claimed, were mediums. The apostles and prophets possessed the same mediumistic gifts. He spoke of the teachings of Jesus, and claimed him as the Spiritualists' own. Did not believe the Bible to be the inspired word of God, but believed the men who wrote it were inspired by angels, and claimed the Bible as the Spiritualists' foundation-stone.

Marvin Babcock, of St. Johns, was the next speaker, and he requested the privilege of kindly criticisng the brother who had preceded him with so much vehemence. He thought his text a very good one, but thought he could giv him one still better—"The right to think and express one's thoughts is the gem of liberty." His style is his own. He has not as high a regard for the Bible as the speaker who preceded him. Does not worship the "God of Moses." Superstitious ideas were assailed without mercy. He could hav no respect, to say nothing of love, for that God, said to be all-wise, merciful, loving, and just, who yet would, "in his wrath," destroy whole nations and slaughter innocent children. If he was that God with the power claimed for him he would hav things different. He would protect the weak, provide for the poor, close up all the rum shops, cure all habits of intemperance, make good health catching instead of disease, relieve all suffering, make everybody happy, do good to all humanity, and kill the devil and Anthony Comstock. He retired amid great applause.

Mrs. Sarah Graves, Grand Rapids, followed Mr. Babcock. She took for her subject, "The School of Life." The angels are our teachers. They depend not upon the truth or honesty of a medium, but upon the organism. Where they find a proper organism, one they can use, they will use it. Her remarks were brief, but well timed and interesting. After a song, Convention adjourned until seven o'clock.

The Michigan Mutual Benefit Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists convened at Stuart's Hall, at 2 P.M., on Saturday, for the annual election of officers and the consummation of other business of the Association. The officers elected for the ensuing year were as follows:

President, J. H. Burnham, Saginaw City; Vice-President, Mrs. R. Shepard, Detroit; Secretary, Mrs. Ida A. McLin, Box B, Kalamazoo; Treasurer, Mrs. R. A. Sheffer, South Haven; Directors, A. B. Spinney. Detroit; L. S. Burdick, Kalamazoo; Mrs. Lottie M. Warner, Paw Paw; Mrs. M. E. French, Greenville; Mrs. Ida A. McLin, Kalamazoo.

Saturday evening session.—Called to order by the President. Song by Bishop A. Beals—"The Promised Land To-morrow." J. H. Palmer, Lapeer, gave the first address of the evening. His subject was, "A Basis of Faith." He said God loves his pagan and Christian children alike. He did not believe in a God who condemns the largest number of the human family. The God of creeds is not the God of justice and love. The God of the world is not a God of terror. The God of the world, who measures the atoms of the universe, measures every anxious mother's cares and love. He could not accept salvation at the sacrifice of another's life. Salvation would be worth nothing if loved ones were lost. He said he was not a Spiritualist or Liberalist, but a Liberal Christian.

After a song by Mr. and Mrs. Jordan, Mrs. E C. Woodruff, of South Haven, entertained the large audience for a time, taking for her subject, "What of the Morning?" Mrs. Woodruff is an old pioneer speaker of real merit. She is well posted in ancient and modern history. Her address was very instructive and well received.

Recitation by Miss M. E. Turpin—"The Creed of the Bells," a few remarks on business by the President, a song, and the Convention adjourned until nine o'clock Sunday morning.

Sunday morning, nine o'clock.—Convention called to order by the President. Conference for one hour. W. M. Wooster, Decatur, spoke in the interest of the camp ground. He is enthusiastic and earnest, and bids fair to be an ornament to our ranks.

Miss Nellie Baade followed, occupying ten minutes.

Dr. E. W. Stivens, of Rock Prairie, Wisconsin, was the next to speak. His brief speech I would like to giv in full, but must be content with a short sketch. He said, I am not of you, but with you. It had been the practice of the world for all time to believe heaven a place and how to reach it, hell a place and how to keep out of it, but in the advent of Spiritualism is the philosophy of heaven a condition and how to attain it, hell the pit of ignorance from which all are growing. Three plans hav been put in operation. First, that of the children of Ham under Nimrod in the land of Shinar. These people took their design from the idea that God dwelt above in the firmament, and undertook to build a tower of "brick and slime" to get to heaven upon. And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower and decided they would succeed if he did not put a stop to it, so he "came down" like a hawk on a brood of chickens and scattered them upon the face of the whole earth by confounding their language, so they failed to get to heaven by special arrangement. Since that confusion men hav been trying to reach heaven on a tower of creeds. The square brick of formalism and the slimes of bigotry hav been brought from Sinai, Calvary, Rome, and Plymouth Rock. Synods, Y. M. C. A. revivals, and prayer circles hav all lent their efforts. Each would be a master builder and giv his name to the sacred edifice. Fire, water, prisons, dungeons, crosses, hells, and vindictive Gods hav all been used to force the work. Visions of upper seats, palms of victory, crowns of glory, mansions of gold, and unpunished sin hav all been used to lure the toiler on up the cathedral aisles of this new Babel. Now God having "come down" to see this tower, hath confounded their tongues by the voice of babes, entranced women, and the many manifestations of Spiritualism. The thunders of truth shake their foundations as the pillar of spiritual fire passes by, and the bending heavens hang thick with omens. These Babels built by men must ever fall. Now a tower is being built, the corner-stones of which are laid in nature. Truth and immortality glitter in their basements. Law and the order of evolution are bringing it up in a progressive column with the growth of the race. Its illuminated summit shall emit light to all the ages. Here we trace the dark outlines of the bleak hills of error, the fogs of Materialism disperse before the rising light of immortality, and heaven is the result of natural growth. The firmaments disappear; angels greet us. Lo, we are in heaven and heaven in us. Thus the great problem is being solved.

He was followed by F. J. Ingalsby, of Jackson, and C. H. Dunning, of Marcellus, Chairman of Executive Committee of the National Liberal League for the state of Michigan. The fifteen minutes allotted him were well spent in the interests of the League. I would like to giv his address in full, but my report is growing lengthy, and I will refer you to No. 4 of the Rational Appeal of April 10, which contains Mr. Dunning's speech in full.

Dr. Spinney made some remarks on mediumship, the work of the association, and the camp ground at Goguac Lake, which he hoped would be secured. After a song, L. S. Burdick presiding, Prof. J. M. Allyn, of Battle Creek, was introduced and addressed the audience. His subject was exclusively reform for man in this life. He said until intemperance in every department of life was outgrown freedom for man was impossible. The mission of the Spiritual movement was to bring about a better condition of life through practical reform. He was pleased with the spirit of harmony manifested between the two elements, Spiritualism and Liberalism, and closed with a poem.

George H. Geer followed, subject, "Cause and Cure of Religion." He drew a vivid contrast between the Materialist and religionist, showing clearly that the Materialist is the most intellectual by developing the sciences far ahead of the religionist.

Sunday afternoon session.—Called to order by L. S. Burdick. Mrs. Lavina Palmer, of Deerfield (trance speaker), gave a short address, and was followed by Marvin Babcock at the request of the audience. He said he was glad of the opportunity to correct a statement he made yesterday. That he had never before thought that he would like to be God till yesterday. Then he did think he would, and he told some things he would do if he was God, and after fixing things all up right, and making everybody happy, he said that he would wipe out hell, kill the devil and Anthony Comstock. But come to think about it, he did not think he would kill the last named. He would try and make a decent man of him. Fruitless as the task might seem, even with God's power, he believed he would try it. After a song, Mr. Burnham, one of the most able lecturers in the Spiritualist and Liberal ranks, was the next to address the audience. He came into our ranks about a year and a half ago, a Liberal but not a Spiritualist, since which time he has earnestly sought for the evidence that would convince him of the truth of the Spiritual philosophy. He has been doing a grand and noble work in the cause of reform, and all this time the spirit world has withheld that evidence which would make him a Spiritualist, and will do so until he has finished his work in the field in which he now labors so earnestly and successfully, aided by the inspiration drawn from the invisible forces that are ever near and around about him, and who will in their own good time giv him that knowledge which will satisfy a hungry, aching, throbbing brain, and that which years of scientific investigation has failed to find. His subject, he said, was not original with himself. He had often heard it said within the last six months, "Liberalism will absorb Spiritualism," and he wondered if it was true. He thought not. He had made the acquaintance of hundreds of noble men and women who were Spiritualists, counted them among his best friends, and had hoped for evidence to come to him that would satisfy his longing soul. His hopes were not satisfied of a life beyond, and had hoped that evidence would come to him, bnt when he heard the evidence adduced on this rostrum yesterday, when Spiritualists claim the Bible and Jesus as their own, and build their faith on that book, they are no better than the Christian, and the Christian's only hope of salvation is in that his book is a lie. Don't try to build Spiritualism upon the same foundation with Christianity. Place it upon its own merits. If it is worth anything let it stand for what it is worth. With the acquaintance he had had with the noble hearts and earnest workers in the ranks of Spiritualism, those who had had the evidence, he firmly believed, had something better than old Christianity, something that possessed sufficient merit to stand for itself; and he felt no fears for Spiritualism. The appreciation of the audience was shown in the rapt attention given to the speaker.

After a song, the Committee on Memoirs reported. Geo. H. Geer, chairman, made some very appropriate and feeling remarks, alluding to the death in the past year of Mrs. Sarah Stoughton, of Otisco, Chas. Bennett and Leonard Phillips, of Milford, De Ashael Beach, C. P. Baldwin, and wife, Mrs. A. D. Baldwin, all of Battle Creek, and M. C. Vandercook, of Allegan. Inspirational singer and composer, Mrs. L E. Bailey gave an original memorial poem on the death of M. C. Vandercook, and Mrs. Jordan sang a memorial song. Charles A. Andrus was the next speaker for the afternoon. It was growing late, and his remarks were brief, much to the regret of the friends.

Sunday evening session —Convention called to order by L. S. Burdick. Song by Mr. and Mrs. Jordan. An invocation by J. P. Whiting, followed by an inspirational poem by Mrs. C. Haddock, of Jackson, on "Prophetic Light." Mr. and Mrs. Jordan sang "While the Days are Going By." Mrs. L. A. Pearsall was the first speaker for the evening on the "Thirty-Second Anniversary of Spiritualism." Mr. Beals sang "'Tis Sweet to Be Remembered." After the song Mrs. Augusta Whiting Anthony was introduced, and said, as it was the Anniversary of Spiritualism, it was also the anniversary of the birth into new life of one of the noble workers in the cause; and paid a feeling tribute to the memory of Hiram D. Robertson, of Albion, whose funeral was attended on Saturday, J. Madison Allyn officiating. After a song by C. H. Dunning, a short communication from the President, Dr. Spinney, was read by Mrs. Spinney, excusing him from being present to deliver the closing address as expected; he, being weary and worn out, could not in justice to himself be with his friends this evening. Chas. Andrus gave the few closing remarks, and with a benediction from Mrs. Pearsall the Convention adjourned till 9 o'clock Monday morning.

Monday morning session.—An informal conference occupied half an hour. Meeting called to order by B. F. Stamm, Detroit. Letters from absent friends were read by the secretary, among them letters from Dr. T. H. Stewart, of Kendallville, Ind.; Elijah Woodworth, of Leslie; Dr. Wm. Jordan, of Thornton; Barton Durfee, of Northville; David J. Brown, of Nankin; W. R. Hill, of Detroit; E. A. Chapman, of Lowell; Dr. Jewett, of Lyons, and many others.

J. M Potter, Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, reported the following:

We, the Spiritualists and Liberalists of the state of Michigan in convention assembled, do hereby adopt the following resolutions as an expression of our feelings on this occasion:

Resolved, That in the union of the various sentiments that pervade our society we hav adopted a method that enables us to put before our progressive people live thoughts that we might otherwise be deprived of.

Resolved, That in the utterances from our platform we indorse and favor an honest expression of thought fro all however widely they may differ, because we believe that through those differences we are enabled to unveil the truth.

Resolved, That we extend to the people of Battle Creek our sincere thanks for their kindness and hospitality upon this occasion.

Resolved, That we feel it our duty to recommend a vote of thanks to the officers of this Association for their impartial and kind treatment at this annual meeting.

Resolved, That in the future as in the past we should cordially co-operate with the officers in their efforts to establish the vital principles of our philosophy.

Resolved, That we extend our hearty thanks to the railroads for the courtesy extended to us, especially to the Northwestern Grand Trunk, which at its own expense advertised our meeting in the various newspapers the entire length of their line.

Resolved, That we associate with our liberality that large charity that enables us to extend to all the right hand of fellowship, and that we cordially invite all phases of religious belief upon our platform, with the feeling that Truth will rise and Error must fall.

After a spirited discussion of the last resolution all were adopted.

Committee on Resolutions: J. M. Potter, Lansing; Chas. A. Andrus, Flushing; O. D. Chapman, Perrinsville; Mrs. M. E. French, Greenville; Mrs. M. C Gale, Flint.

After the report on resolutions the President gave a short address. He said: "At the beginning of the calling of this Convention we desired to fully test whether we as a State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists were to liv or die; whether an organization of every shade of Spiritual and Liberal thought were a possibility or not. Many organizations hav said they had a free rostrum, yet only free as it served to build up their ism, sect, or party. When their peculiar views, hobbies, or interests were assailed, they found preaching was easier than practice. At the outset we invited every Spiritual, Liberal, and Materialist speaker in the state, with every clergyman ever known to be in the least inclined to Liberalism or Spiritualism. Some fifty or sixty persons were thus invited. Of that number many are present; many others sent greetings and communications. Also every society known to be Liberal or Spiritual anywhere in the state was invited and asked to send from three to five delegates. Every society has sent its delegates, I believe; and though we hav not officially and legally acted as a representative body, yet morally and in fact we hav thus acted. We also invited every medium or person supposed to be a medium to come, and assured them that all would be done that was possible in the way of entertainment and notice of their gifts. We also invited every paper in the country known to be Spiritual or Liberal to appoint or send some suitable person to represent their paper or interests. We giv all Spiritual and Liberal papers a free rostrum and free distribution.

1. Every speaker, whether in the past friends or foes to the association, hav equally and impartially had their rights, spoken their views, and been respectfully treated by all responsible.

2. Each medium, whether indorsed, praised, or condemned, has had just and equal rights.

3. Each journal, paper, book, or pamphlet, or delegate or representative for the same, has had equal rights, privileges, and courtesies, and until delegates or representatives arrived the officers cared for their interests.

4. Persons not known as speakers or mediums in or out of the state hav been invited to our rostrum, and in every particular enjoyed the same rights, freedom, and attention as though advertised.

5. The Finance Committee hav, just as far as possible, or will, pay all parties, making no distinctions on account of past conditions, affiliations, or relations to the society, and in every respect redeeming all pledges made by its officers.

6. We hav thus met armies from the east, west, north, and south with interests which are and do extend ove, a nation, and into the blood, and sincere heart, and brain of all our best interests of civilization, from basement to dome, from center to circumference. Each has unsheathed his own blade, fought with his own weapon, camped in his own tent, and used his own line of warfare. Many wounds hav been made, many hearts hav ached, yet each has, we hope and feel, had justice done him or her. The result has been that true democracy has prevailed, and the majority hav concluded and perfected for the first time in Michigan a legally organized society of Spiritualists and Liberalists. We still further hope and expect to carry out this spirit of progress by inviting friends, sympathizers, and enemies, if we hav any, to forget their enmity, and we will, hand in hand, toil on together, not for self, but for humanity.

Following the president's address, J. H. Burnham spoke in the interest of the camp ground. He said when you talk about your camp ground don't talk about beautiful lots and beautiful hotels. Those we hav everywhere. Don't put it on the ground of rest, don't talk of a place to rest, but tell the people we are going there to do something. We are to-day marshaling our forces to fight for a bloodless victory. Tell the people that the "Mecca" up there is to be a school. We are knocking at the door of the future. We mean to do something besides making this a place of rest. We propose to hav a school where we can educate our children as we wish to hav them educated. Don't talk about a place of rest while we are facing the enemy. Let us go to work and do something, and show the people that we mean business, that we are a power in the land, and people will respect us. We can command their respect. His short speech called out remarks from M. Babcock, B. F. Stamm, Mrs. Woodruff, Mrs. Gale, and others.

Report of Finance Committee was read, accepted, and referred to the Auditing Committee. The meeting adjourned until 2 o'clock P.M.

Monday afternoon session.—Called to order by B. F. Stamm. Song by Mr. A. M. Jordan. C. S. Rowley of Cassapolis read a very fine spiritual poem. Mrs. A. E N. Rich, of Jackson, gave a very fine original poem, entitled, "Gold," which was listened to with interest, but was too lengthy to include in my report. The entire afternoon was devoted to the camp ground interest, and many good speeches were made. Among the leading ones were J. H. White, of Port Huron, Chairman of Camp Ground Committee, followed by J. W. Potter, A. B. Sayles, Alfred Keyser, Abner Hitchcock, Mrs. Woodruff, Mrs. Graves, and many others. Considerable interest was aroused. Mr. Jordan sang the song entitled, "You are Going Right Along," and the meeting adjourned until seven o'clock.

Monday evening sesssion.—Called to order by L. S. Burdick. A song by Mr. and Mrs. Gordon. While waiting for the report of the Camp Ground Committee the time was occupied by J. H. Burnham, Dr. J. V. Spencer, J. M. Potter, W. M. Wooster, Mrs. Gale, Mrs. Woodruff, L. S. Burdick, C. S. Rowley, and others. The Committee reported, a motion having been made to extend the time six months for the more thorough canvassing of the country. Arrangements hav been made with the owner of the ground to grant them six months more time and also to allow us to hold a camp-meeting on the ground during that time. They also reported nearly one thousand dollars additional subscriptions as the result of the afternoon labors of the Committee. The Committee expressed themselves satisfied that the necessary amount to pay for the ground could be raised in the next six months. After a song by Mr. Gordon the Convention adjourned.

At a meeting of the Executive Board held on Tuesday morning the following arrangements and resolutions were made and adopted:

1. Resolved, That a quarterly meeting be held at Charlotte some time during the first half of June.
2. Resolved, That the Camp-Meeting and Semi-Annual be held together, at Battle Creek, on the proposed Camp-Ground, commencing August 18th and closing August 23rd.
3. Resolved, That Mr. A. A. Whitney act as Chairman of the Committee for perfecting arrangements for carrying out the purposes of the Camp-Meeting. He to select such persons to assist him as he thinks proper, subject to the approval of the Executive Board.
4. Resolved, That J. H. White make such arrangements with speakers from abroad for said meeting as he may think proper, subject to the approval of the Board.
5. Resolved, That Mrs. M. E. French hav charge of the Lyceum interest, subject to the approval of the Board.
6. Resolved, That Augustus Day hav charge of the book interest, subject to the approval of the Board.
7. Resolved, That all papers be represented by the owners or agents for the same among the people, but not from the rostrum.
8. Resolved, That Mrs. R. A. Sheffer be elected Treasurer of this Association.
9. Resolved, That the Finance Committee consist of three persons, Chairman, Mrs. R. A. Sheffer, South Haven; Dr. J. V. Spencer, Battle Creek; Mrs. J. E. Corbett, Detroit.
10. Resolved, That a new form for missionary cards be executed, and that the title of "Rev." be affixed to all male and female applicants for said cards.
11. Resolved, That J. H. White be authorized to correspond with the several railroads and secure, if possible, a pass for our President over the several roads when on business for the Association.
12. Resolved, That the President shall indorse all permits for half-fare rates.
13. Resolved, That the details of reappointing committees, procuring of speakers and mediums, and other detail of arrangments for all meetings be referred to the President, Secretary, and B. F. Stamm, all of Detroit, and that Frank J. Luick, of Otisco, be appointed Assistant Secretary of this Association. And that this Committee hav power to appoint or revoke, and secure such assistance as they may require, subject to the approval of the Board.
14. Resolved, That the expenses of the officers of the Association when attending the meetings shall be paid out of the proceeds of said meeting.

The Convention was the largest attended and the most successful of any ever held in the state. Perfect harmony prevailed throughout the entire meeting. The two elements in Spiritualism seem to be more firmly united than ever before. The Association is now legally organized on a firm legal basis. Now let every Spiritualist, Liberalist, Materialist, Freethinker, and anti-orthodox come and join our Association and by so doing aid in placing it upon a firm financial basis. You are all well aware that it has been attended with no little expense to do the work that has been done, and thus far a few noble, earnest workers hav toiled on and borne the burdens. Now is the time when all interested in the cause of reform, the freedom of the world, and the good of humanity, should come forward and aid in the good work, and you can do so by sending in your name and address, with one dollar, to the Secretary, Miss J. R. Lane, 312 Woodward avenue, Detroit, and receive your certificate of membership by return mail. The names of persons becoming members of the Association will soon be published. Help to swell the list. Help to further the good work that is moving so successfully onward by your interest and kindly sympathy, and more especially with your dollars and you will find your reward in doing good, and the angels will bless you. MISS J. R. LANE, 312 Woodward avenue, Secretary of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists.

Law vs. Common Sense and Justice.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Supreme Courts of Michigan and of Maine hav recently rendered decisions in cases involving the scope, purpose, and limitation of the Sunday laws. These decisions and the reasonings that are intended to justify them are examples of how owlishly wise a judicial tribunal may be and yet not utter a word of common sense. "In the former case a Methodist preacher had made an appeal to his congregation during the usual Sunday services for money and subscriptions for the purchase of a church building. The defendant in this action subscribed $25, but afterwards refused to pay it, and when suit was brought against him, he pleaded that the subscription or promise being made on Sunday was not legal, and therefore could not be enforced. The statutes of Michigan prohibit, under penalty of a fine, every person seen doing on Sunday any manner of labor, business, or work, except only works of necessity or charity. The Supreme Court says that taking subscriptions on Sunday is not a work of necessity, for the reason that it can be done at another time. There is no doubt, says the court, that this is the most convenient time to attend to the matter, but it might for the same reason hav been the most convenient time for doing other business, such as the trading of horses, the hiring of laborers, and the general settlement of accounts, had the persons present been disposed to engage in such transactions." Now this reasoning is sound, granting the rightfulness of Sunday laws, and had the court stopped here and rendered a decision in accordance therewith it would hav shown to the world that it desired to be fair and impartial in the enforcement of the laws and would hav been entitled to the respect of Secularists, though they must hav continued to regard the statute as a tyrannical invasion of the rights of the individual.

But the court did not stop here; it must find a way of escape for the church, else the odious law would become a dead letter or be repealed as the result of the honest adjudication of this and similar cases and the consequent impartial enforcement of the statute.

Our account proceeds: "But the taking of subscriptions, as the court holds, is a work of charity, which comes within the exception made by the statute. All the necessary or usual work, says the opinion, connected with religious worship is work of charity. Otherwise the preacher, the organist, and the sexton would violate the law whenever they performed their church duties on Sunday. The subscription was, therefore, held to be lawful, and the defendant was bound to pay it."

Mark the reason given for deciding that taking the subscription was a work of charity. It must be a work of charity, "otherwise the preacher, organist, and sexton would violate the law whenever they performed their duties on Sunday!"

No valid reason is given why the paid services of the church are works of charity, but they are assumed to be such for the sole and avowed purpose of shielding the old hag of superstition from her own rebounding boomerang. It seems never to hav occurred to the court that the statute under interpretation was a direct interference with the freedom of the citizen in the interest of the church and a flagrant violation of the national Constitution. No, this decision is a proclamation from the church through the Supreme Court of the state of Michigan that the organized enemy of liberty and equal rights is to be protected at all hazards from the operation of her own tyrannical statute; that Christianity is a state religion, to be protected and fostered by all the powers of the commonwealth, and that outside of the pale of the national superstition no man is secure in person, liberty, or property from the invasive intolerance of the minions of this hierarchy, and that he need expect no justice at the hands of its pliant tools, the ermined judges of our religion-cursed land.

In the Maine case, the pivotal question was whether it is lawful to walk on Sunday in the highways for exercise. The plaintiff had sued the city of Portland to recover damages for injuries received by reason of a defective sidewalk. He had gone out one Sunday afternoon to take a walk for recreation. He stopped in a saloon and got a glass of beer, and on his return fell on the sidewalk and broke his leg. The statute of Maine is substantially the same as that of Michigan, already noted. Under the facts which hav been cited, the city claimed that even if the highway was defective, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The Supreme Court holds otherwise. Walking on Sunday for exercise in the open air, it says, is not unlawful. Stopping for a glass of beer may hav been a violation of the statute, but unless it contributed to the accident it was no excuse for a defective highway, and could not exempt the city from liability.

This discussion is in accordance with justice, but how it can be shown to be sanctioned by the law would be difficult to tell. The Michigan court held that raising money on Sunday to purchase a church was not a work of necessity, as it could be done at some other time, and it seems that the same reasoning would hold good in this case, unless it could be shown that the plaintiff's time was not his own upon the other six days of the week, that he could take this needed recreation only on Sunday. Then it would hav to be proved that this exercise of walking was an absolute necessity for his mental or physical health, for of course it could not for a moment be pretended that this walking was a work of charity. So we see that while the decision of the court was a just and common-sense one, it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile it with the statute involved. In fact, the decision would seem to hav been rendered in accordance with the dictates of reason, and at the behest of justice, regardless of what the statute prescribed.

But is it not about time that these miserable partisan laws were swept from our statute books? Has not the League ample justification for its existence in the fact of the survival and continued enforcement of these bigoted and puritanical enactments of the ages gone by? And see what an incentive to dishonesty these laws offered! In both these cases it was sought to escape from the just obligations of contracts through the instrumentality of laws enacted in favor of a special religion. The Sunday laws must go. Religious freedom demands it. The organic law of the nation, and of most of the states demands it. Common honesty demands it, and the enlightened conscience of mankind demands it. Sweep them away! Let our friends in the various states keep a sharp lookout for such cases as those reported above. Publish them far and wide. Knowledge is what we want. Spread the light.

A Letter from Parker Pillsbury.

CINCINNATI, O., May 7, 1880.

MY DEAR FRIEND LELAND: Your card of invitation pursued me a thousand miles to this city, where, less than a year ago, we met for the first time.

I came here on a retreat from our east coast winds, the foe most to be dreaded in these time that try the souls of men and women; at least the foe most dreaded by me.

My health permits me no attendance on conventions of any exciting kind.

And if your gathering at Chickering Hall was not an excitement, an agitation, an incipient revolution, it was not up to the demand nor the signs of the times.

It seems to me there never was, in the whole history of civilized jurisprudence, a more atrocious outrage on decency as well as justice than was developed (devil-oped) in the trial of Bennett. If the judge who presided over it and pronounced its decisions can go through life and through death without horrors and tortures of conscience, and regrets and remorse such as can only be felt and feared by ghosts unblest and devils damned, then indeed has human depravity reached so sublime a hight as to make hell no more a doubt than it is a just desert and righteous retribution for such mockeries and blasphemies against all the holiest instincts of human nature and the rights of man.

Thanks are due also to the Committee on Music, especially to Mr. Booth and the singers, whose names are mentioned in the report of the meeting.

Had I attended your meeting I could hav said no more than this, and should hav said no less.

Please present my congratulations to Mr. Bennett on his almost miraculous escape from a death which I know his persecutors would gladly hav inflicted had it been in their power, and which they no doubt hoped would ensue under their inflictions; and believe me, dear friend,

Yours for all good words and works,

PARKER PILLSBURY.

Welcome to D. M. Bennett.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The slow night passes, and the glowing morn
Comes with its thousand banners of bright hope,
And music of the progress of the world.
The toil is over, and the galling chain,
The harsh command of superstition's slaves;
And golden liberty again is thine.
Free, strong, and brave thou art for grander deeds,
For nobler exercise of mind and heart.
Paine blooms to victory sublime and fair;
To fruit eternal on the tree of life
For coming ages, that the struggling soul
May hav more joyous quest of truth and right.
Yes, trampled Justice lifts her brow again,
Her right arm stretched in bold relief,
And sweeps the flag of freedom through the air.
Welcome from stripes to flaming stars of hope;
Welcome to sunny air and cheer of men;
Welcome to splendid fields of effort vast—
To glories, inspirations, and delights
Won from the bosom of refulgent truth!
Welcome to battle 'gainst the hideous wrong;
Welcome to manhood's far-awakening host,
And all the wondrous wealth that is to be
When the unconquered soul shall wear its crown,
And science shall upbuild its temple bright,
Full of sweet music and unclouded joy!
Welcome from darksome dungeons of the past
To the revealing future's stately realm;
To Reason, Knowledge, fair Humanity,
Gemmed with the arts that make for living good;
Shaping the world to heaven of all our thoughts.
Thou hast been serf to wrong, but wrong shall now
Be made to tremble at thy freeborn words,
And cringe before thee with its helpless curse.
The right shall triumph, for a million hearts
Leap to giv welcome to a tyrant's foe.
Thou shalt be monarch, not in purple garb,
But in the glory of plain, simple work,
Of sturdy independence and free will;
For, in the grand republic of the mind,
One honest heart is a majority,
And wears the royal robe of chainless might.

Logic of Facts.—Logic of Errors.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please do me the favor to find space in your open columns to reply to a very rude writer in your issue of April 25th.

Mr. Chapman will pardon me if I do not follow his bad example of rudeness or show any angry feelings at his abusive way of writing. I happen to be one of those who do not take abuse for argument, and what is more, I am thoroughly convinced that my opponent will find it a better way to discuss his pet theories patiently and fairly. I will here say, for the benefit of my critic, that such arguments can be returned with interest. I will return it for his enlightenment, not in anger, but in grief.

I will now ask the attention of my angry critic to the following argument; the reason why I ask him is because he thinks that Spiritualism is true. Take a trance medium under control. The medium is the instrument, the control is the intelligence. I speak not to the medium, but to the intelligence, to the control. The medium is not to hear or see, neither question, nor act, because the medium could answer any question if he heard it, or tell what was going on if he could see the actors, hence it would not be spirit but the man (medium). The medium, for the time under control, is only a thing, an instrument through which the spirit manifests its intelligence, therefore to the intelligence I speak and not to the instrument. Can Mr. Control hear and hear me without the ears and eyes of Mr. Instrument? If Mr. Control answers no, then Mr. Control is both blind and see without the eyes and ear of Mr. Instrument. Should the answer be yes, then Mr. Control will oblige by reading this newspaper which I hold behind the head of Mr. Instrument. I hav no hatred, no fear of Spiritualism; I wish it was true, but I hav a greater love for truth than to allow my desires to mislead me. I take facts as my guide. What are the facts of Spiritualism? Seances and trance-speaking mediums. Spirits come to the seances, travel up and down the country with trance speakers. Spirits are said to be very wise, although they talk very strange philosophy. I will test the intelligence of these spirits. Can Mr. Chapman's spirits inform who I am? Can they tell him why he wrote that angry letter? Can they not find him better arguments in the future? Can they tell him why the moon cannot prevent the smallest particle of water that is falling under her orb from coming to this earth, while she is said to attract the spring tides?

If Mr. Chapman is willing, and the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER willing to allow us to discuss this subject through that paper, then will come the "tug of war."

Faithfully yours, CHARLES AUDLEY.

Personal.

W. F. Jamieson gave eight lectures in Saranac, Mich., May 2–8th. He lectured in Train Hall, Lowell, Mich., May 9–14th. Address him at Lowell, Mich. Prof. Jamieson is booked to reply to Gen. Samuel F. Carey in Lowell.

person I supposed to be a friend, and in them I used language as free and unreserved as one would use in conversation. I hav admitted that the letters were improper, but they were not written with evil or criminal intent; and in not one of them did I ask for anything criminal. In one of the worst quoted against me I expressly said I wanted love, but not sinfully or immorally. The letters as a whole show more the unsophisticated simpleton than the deep, designing knave.

2 The letters were private. They concerned no living person except the one to whom written. Comstock, Bundy, Ellis, Abbot, and Underwood had not the least business with them. It was most disreputable in the person who made merchandise of them, and it was most cruel and ungentlemanly in the persons named to publish them to the world, especially as at the time I had been unjustly thrown into prison by the common enemy; and the publication of the letters could do no possible good, but, on the other hand, harm, by furnishing the enemy with weapons to attack not only myself but the cause of Liberalism generally. I could not know of the attacks thus made, nor hav a fair chance to reply to them.

3. The letters had been repented of. Efforts had been made to get them back that they might be destroyed. My wife had been informed by myself of my writing them, and she had grandly forgiven me.

4 Charles Ellis, in the capacity of special agent and defamer for Bundy's R. P. Journal, came dishonorably into possession of the letters, and wrote the false and slanderous language and vile epithets which accompanied their publication, ten times worse than the letters themselves, which subsequently appeared in both the R.-P. Journal and the Index.

5. It is said that Comstock and his friends furnished the money which paid for the letters. They were also laid before R B. Hayes to prevent my being released from imprisonment. This is vouched for by persons who possess inside information.

6. On the 21st of September, 1879 Underwood, Ellis, and Savage met at the house of the latter, in Greenwood, Mass., in secret conclave or conspiracy to read over those letters and to decide what could be done with them to injure me, though at the time I was confined in a solitary prison cell. This is based on information direct from Savage.

7. It was decided then and there that the letters should be published. My years of hard labor were set aside entirely. The fact that in addition to the ceaseless struggle I had made to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER alive I had published over two hundred books and pamphlets, five thousand pages of which I had written myself, was disregarded; the mantle of charity was by no means extended over me. No apology or consideration was made for human fallibility, but the fiendish purpose to damn and ruin me was avowed and pronounced.

8. Underwood stated to more than one person about that time that "Bennett must be crushed." "The Liberals of the country can not sustain him in the positions he has taken, and he must be destroyed," or words to that effect. Anything to kill Bennett. The private letters I had thoughtlessly written to one I had mistaken as a friend were to be used as the weapons to kill me.

9. When I learned this within the walls of the Albany Penitentiary, it felt to me most unbrotherly, ungenerous, and cruel. I regarded it as far meaner than the persecutions of my Christian enemies, with Comstock at their head. I would rather hav remained in prison an additional twelve months than to have had such an unfeeling, unnecessary, and cruel attack made upon me.

10 Notwithstanding Underwood looked over those letters at Savage's house, when Bundy brought out his fifteen columns of letters, slander, vituperation, and lies, the latter claimed that he telegraphed Underwood to come at once to Chicago to giv his opinion as to the genuineness of the letters. Underwood promptly complied with Bundy's request. When in THE TRUTH SEEKER office in the latter part of January last Underwood stated that he made that trip to Chicago at the earnest solicitation of several of my friends. There seems to be not a little hypocrisy in the matter. It was wholly useless for him to leave his business and perform a journey of three hundred miles and back, either at the request of Bundy or my friends, to see if the letters were genuine, when he had already examined them at Greenwood, pronounced them genuine, and authorized their publication.

11. The statement or insinuation in Underwood's letter that I had tried to seduce and ruin a virtuous girl contains three positive falsehoods. 1. I did not try to seduce nor ruin her. 2. She is not virtuous. 3. She is no girl, being midway between thirty and forty years of age.

12. Underwood's advice or instructions to the Liberal public to no longer have confidence in me, and to withdraw their sympathy from me, was unworthy a great and true man, and wholly unlike the noble and magnanimous Elizur Wright and James Parton.

13. His statement that it was at his solicitation that Col. Ingersoll interfered to obtain a pardon for me from the President is most unfair and untrue. Mr. Leland had previously visited Washington for the express purpose of seeing Ingersoll on the subject. He spent the better part of a day with him and secured the Colonel's services in my behalf.

14. Underwood's effort to commit Col. Ingersoll against me, and his pretense that the Colonel had "left me to my fate" on account of my "immorality," was very unkind. How untruthful it was may be gathered from this brief extract from a letter of Col. Ingersoll to my wife: "When you write your husband tell him for me I hav not and will not join in the cry against him. I am no Pharisee."

15 It was most ungenerous and untruthful in Underwood to style me a "culprit" "an old sinner," to denounce THE TRUTH SEEKER as "indecent" and "obscene," its patrons as the "tag-rag and bobtail" of Liberals, while he claimed to represent a very distinct class, and in sympathy with the most conservative of Christians.

16 When Underwood wrote to Bundy that the perusal of my letter left in his mind "a feeling of unutterable disgust," it is thought he allowed himself to be unnecessarily exercised. If he is given to disgust it would perhaps be quite as well for him to feel disgust at his own conduct rather than other peoples'. He has certainly shown himself guilty of conduct which gentlemen would scorn to commit. Even gallantries to ladies, which he seems to hate in others, he doubtless looks upon with more favor when performed by himself. If the statements of friends be true he has shown marked partiality for ladies, not only in California, but in states east of it. I insist that in those letters of mine which troubled him so deeply I broke no law, human or divine, and interfered with the rights of no person under heaven.

17. Underwood visited me in Ludlow Street Jail just before I was removed to Albany in July last. In our conversation I said to him that I hoped for continued friendly relations with him. I had endeavored to always treat him kindly. I had published all he had sent me for publication, including his debates, his lectures, and essays; that I had not said an unkind word of him; we had several business transactions together which I trusted had been pleasant, but that I had thought he was too much of an Abbot man, and was to that extent governed by a narrow, intolerant spirit. He replied with a leering smile that it would be more correct to say that Abbot was an Underwood man, and that Abbot followed him more than he followed Abbott. I thought and implied the same that if he claimed the paternity or the conduct of which Abbot had been guilty, including his slanders, misstatements, and falsehoods, that I did not wish to be guilty of depriving him of whatever honor there might be attached to it.

18. He was cruel enough at the same time to inform me that his wife did not like me nor my paper. Had he known how that bit of information wounded me, though the feeling was mutual, and how for long months' afterward, while leading my dreary prison life, the painful assurance that the angelic Sara neither liked THE TRUTH SEEKER nor its editor, so often presented itself to my troubled memory, I cannot think he would thus wantonly have destroyed my happiness and peace of mind.

19. He visited me again in the Albany prison in the fore part of February last; but I could not feel that it was the visit of a friend. He gave me to understand there would be no further personal attacks made upon me. I acquiesced in the welcome intelligence, and remarked that I had begun no quarrel upon anyone, and that in every instance the quarrels had been forced upon me. How truthfully his assurances were may be judged by the dirty, ungentlemanly attacks that have been renewed against me as soon as I left the prison walls. He also told me at that time that he disapproved of my "Seventh Letter from Albany," in which I exposed the falsehoods of the Rev. Howard Crosby and mentioned some points of resemblance between Jesus and myself. He thought the letter rough and in bad taste. I remembered that I never had written anything that had given him satisfaction. I presume "unutterable disgust" is the feeling which my writings always giv him. A friend with him was kind enough to say that he and others thought I had gone crazy. My reply was that if they had to endure what had been imposed upon me possibly even they might talk a little rough, or be taken to be going crazy.

20 Underwood was not in the most honorable employment possible, when co-operating with such persons as Ellis, Comstock, McNellis, Abbot, and Bundy to do their best in "crushing Bennett" because he had committed a silly indiscretion.

21. Ellis, the accomplice with Underwood in the grand enterprise of "crushing Bennett," showed the most despicable traits of character. Besides writing columns of lying, slanderous assertions, epithets, distortions, exaggerations, misrepresentations, and maliciousness, besides making public a private letter I had written to himself, he entered into the service of the despicable Bundy, only too ready to do his dirty work of slander and vilification. For several weeks he was an attaché of the R. P. Journal.

22. While I was in prison at Albany he wrote a most infamous letter to my wife. The following is a part of the latter:

8 PORTLAND ST., BOSTON, MASS., Feb. 24, 1880.

MADAM: I inclose you my reply to J. S. Verity. Please do not allow your suspicions of me, if you hav any, to deter you from insisting that my reply be published at once. If I wished to make an attack on your husband, I should do it on something a good deal worse than writing insane letters to a girl he wanted to seduce. Do not be deterred from publishing my reply by fear of Seaver and Mendum. They dare not tackle you, and will never crawl in the grass again. . . . But now I don't want to be any more to the point than is necessary to make you understand me. You hav allowed Seaver and Mendum to attack me in your paper. I must reply to them. If you refuse, then hear: I hold proof of the treatment which you hav received, including attempt to MURDER, that will utterly destroy the man if the exposure is made. You know what I mean. If you want to force that out, continue to attack me. If not, help me, and in return you will gain more by my silence than you could from the false support of a thousand Investigators.

I am very truly yours, CHARLES ELLIS.

Can any one believe that the man who, under all the circumstances, could pen such a letter as that is a gentleman? His threats and insinuations are equally vile, and as devoid of truth as he is of honor. There is not the slightest ground in the world for him to base his insinuations upon. All utterly and maliciously false. Underwood ought to be proud of such a companion.

23. The conduct of Ellis at Salem, Ohio, where he deeply wronged a most excellent woman and then deserted her, is well known to many persons. It was well known to Underwood, who has to his friends commented on the bad character and bad faith of Ellis. Still he met that man Ellis on terms of equality, and in the most disreputable attempt to damn the reputation and destroy the business of an old man whom he admits was unjustly thrown into prison and whose only crime consisted in writing indiscreet letters to one who has fully proved herself a base, false, and most malicious woman.

24 I find among the R.-P. Journals which I was not permitted to see while in prison, a mean and ungentlemanly attack from that saintly hypocrite, Hudson Tuttle, in which he utters several base insinuations and positive falsehoods, only a few of which I will notice. After insinuating in the most unfavorable style, denominating me "the last and greatest crowning fraud," accusing me of having "sold the welfare and honor of a great cause for a selfish purpose," with bearing "Materialism and Liberalism into the hideous slime of obscenity and making both the pimps of my brutal passion," he proceeds to use this language: "He has ignored and sneered at the cause (Spiritualism) continuously; but as it is allied to Liberalism, the disgrace to the latter is reflected, and every Spiritualist feels that he is the loser by this dastardly conduct of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER." Here are as many falsehoods as could well be crowded into so small a space. Leaving unnoticed his base flings about "crowning fraud," "would-be martyr," "brutal passion," "moral putridity," etc., I will simply say Tuttle uttered a gross falsehood when he said that I hav continuously ignored and sneered at the cause of Spiritualism; and how a man who makes the pretension he does to truth and honor could utter such base falsehoods is most incomprehensible I hav ever treated Spiritualism and Spiritualists with respect and fairness. I hav honestly investigated the phenomena when I hav had an opportunity to do so, and hav frankly published my convictions. I hav several times stated that I hav found in the phenomena proofs of intelligence not connected with physical organizations and not explainable by the flippant charge of "fraud." I hav, on numerous occasions, acknowledged the good which Spiritualism has wrought in advancing Liberal thought and sentiment in the last quarter of a century. I hav freely admitted Spiritualistic articles into my columns and upon the same terms as opposing articles. I hav never "sneered at" nor "ignored" Spiritualism. Many of my best and nearest friends are Spiritualists; and I hav been, and am still, proud to acknowledge them as such. What can be thought of Tuttle, who, for years, has been closely connected as principal contributor and adviser with the R.-P. Journal, when he knew its editor and proprietor was living in flagrant and open adultery; when he fellowships with and apologizes for one or more well known to be repeatedly guilty of gross sodomitic practices, to thus turn and lie about a man who has not committed adultury, who has not committed sodomy, but who merely wrote some over-confidential, familiar, harmless letters to one he mistook for an honorable friend? Let Tuttle hereafter be ranked with defamers, slanderers, base falsifiers, and hypocrites. His pretended "purity" will not save him from the ignominy due him.

25. Abbot is charged by those intimately acquainted with him with too persistent indulgence in what are called marital privileges, and thus destroying the health and happiness of his wife. I hav nothing to say upon that subject, but I do reiterate the charge that he has been guilty of repeated falsehoods with respect to myself—that he has pursued me for years with malice and defamation, that he has persistently sought to destroy me and my business, and that to effect this he has mailed his slander and lies to thousands of my friends and patrons, whose names were dishonorably obtained from a list stolen from my office.

26 Of Bundy and his lies, his malice, his envy, his defamations, his meanness, and villainies, I hav heretofore expressed myself freely, and would be glad if I never had occasion to use his despised name again. He has purposely and manignantly injured me and misrepresented me most deeply, and has proved himself devoid of honor, virtue, and truth.

I wish not to say much here about Comstock. His villainies, his persecutions, his falsehoods, his perjuries, his depravity, his meannesses, and all his contemptible and unmanly methods hav already been sufficiently dwelt upon heretofore. It may be only necessary to remark here that he is a worthy coadjutor with the foregoing in the work of defamation and slander.

27. These are the men who conspired against me while I was serving out an unjust sentence in prison—which they hav admitted to be unjust—and hav tried to blast my reputation before the world, to destroy the work of usefulness in which I am engaged, and to render utterly valueless my hard earnings of years of every dollar's worth of property I hav in the world. This has been prompted by the meanest of all motives—envy, jealousy, and malice—and without the slightest provocation on my part for their conduct. I hav never mistreated one of the persons named, nor did I ever speak an unkind word of either of them until they commenced their vile attacks upon me. Why they should assail me in the base manner they hav is a mystery to me even unto this day.

28. I hav now said all upon this subject I wish to. As I had seen while in prison but a small part of the attacks that were made upon me, and as I had while there but a poor chance for replying, I claim the privilege of alluding once to the unpleasant subject now that I am at liberty again. But I wish to hav no more to say about it, and I know it must be distasteful to my readers. My time is important; life is short and swiftly passing away; I hav much useful work I wish to perform, and I propose to take no further notice of scurrilous attacks of foes whether sent over the country anonymously, or whether they appear in the slanderous columns of the R.-P. Journal or Index. If I hav made mistakes I will endeavor to make no more. I shall aim to lead a good life, to perform my duty as faithfully as I know how, and to be always loyal to truth, liberty, and justice. In this aim of my life I hope to retain the confidence and co-operation of my numerous kind and indulgent friends. I am, sincerely, D. M. BENNETT.

Two Letters from James Parton.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., May 10, 1880.

MY DEAR EDITOR: You are a prodigy of industry. I hav received your first portly volume and hav put it in plain sight to be examined at the first opportunity. Your letter followed it. If I hav been of any service to you or the cause you represent, and for which you suffered, I am very glad. There certainly was a moment when, if your friends and allies had faltered, the enemy would hav had you at a terrible disadvantage.

With regard to the tract against you, of which I hav been favored with two copies by mail, my position is this:

The immorality involved in compiling and sending the tract is greater than the immorality charged in it. The interests of morality require, therefore, the rejection of the tract.

What you hav now to do is to make THE TRUTH SEEKER the wisest, boldest, kindest, sauciest, most fascinating paper ever published on earth; and this you can do, because you need hav no lying, cowardly reserves. The whole range of the universe is yours. Never mind your enemies. The success of the paper upholds you and repays them.

One precaution: keep the paper very pure, very free from the least taint of the indecent.

With my congratulations to Mrs. Bennett,

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

[The following was written to T. B. Wakeman and we trust we are not violating good faith in laying it before our readers.]

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., May 8, 1880.

MY DEAR AND VALUED FRIEND: I hav just finished reading the full account of the meeting in Chickering Hall. It seems to hav been all that the most sanguine could hav anticipated, and your speech as usual, the weighty feature. You take the laboring oar by right of superior strength. Send Mr. Bennett to Congress by all means. Send him for the purpose of restoring the lost sanctity of the mails.

Still, the main point is to support, improve, and extend the paper. If that goes well, all goes well. If that declines, all languishes. Ever yours, JAMES PARTON.

Wasn't that Thunder?—Notes on the Reception.

BY THERON C. LELAND.

Well, the Great Reception has come and gone. And it was a magnificent success. No one inexperienced in such work can realize the amount of labor required to arrange for such a demonstration nor the anxiety with which the result of all the effort is awaited. New York is an immense city; and, with all its conflicting interests and competing attractions, it takes a small earthquake to arrest its attention. It isn't every cause that has a small earthquake to set in motion. We didn't know that we had one till we began to pump for it. The Reception Committee, at first, thought and talked only of a modest informal gathering of personal friends in some small hall, or else in a hotel, for a dinner and toasts and speeches.

But, at one of the early meetings of the Committee, Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker of Boston dropped in. We questioned him about his management of the celebrated Heywood Indignation Meeting in Faneuil Hall two years ago. He explained his methods, made valuable suggestions, and gave us so much courage as to possibilities that we resolved to adopt his patent, put improvements on it, and "go him one better." The Committee met twice a week, the work was divided up and assigned to Sub-Committees, and every possible detail was looked after. Cooper Institute was applied for and refused. Then Chickering Hall was engaged and paid for, so there could be no backing out. Meantime contributions to meet expenses came in liberally from friends who felt the importance of the enterprise. Announcements in the city press began on Sunday, April 25th, and were kept up during the week. The New York World and Evening Post refused our advertisements—which will be borne in mind by all advertising Liberals. The new and bright little daily paper, Truth, with its 40,000 circulation, was a great help to us. Over 30,000 little handbills and 5,000 card tickets were carefully distributed by hands and eyes that would see to it that they were placed where they would do the most good.

It was announced that Mr. Bennett would appear and speak in his prison garb. This, Truth opposed as ill-advised, and the following communication was sent and published in vindication of the idea, which, however, subsequent events made it impossible to carry out:

D. M. BENNETT IN PRISON GARB.

To the Editor of Truth, Sir: Symbols of degradation are relative. Circumstances may make them a badge of honor to the victim and an ignominy only to the tyrants who impose them. There hav been many historical instances in point, chief of which was Jesus Christ, who was hung—hung by God, who sent him, his only begotten son, into this incarnate world for that very purpose, and the cross has been a symbol of honor ever since. So has the crown of thorns.

In our own day the Slavocrats branded Captain Walker "S. S." (slave-stealer) in the hand, and the brave Captain carried it and exhibited it for thirty years as a mark of proud distinction. Scars received in the service of humanity are honorable. Mr. Bennett's prison garb is a kind of portable scar, which he can put on or off on appropriate occasions. By all means let us see him and receive him in the regimentals of his honorable service. THE CEE LEE.

On Saturday the editors of the principal morning papers were seen personally, assured that there would be a formidable demonstration, and warned that they could not afford to fail to giv a good report of it, if only as a matter of news. And it was fairly well reported, though with the usual groundless charge of obscenity.

THE SECOND OF MAY CAME.

It dawned bright and beautiful, clouding up a little towards night, but remaining balmy and fair to the close. The Committee held its last meeting on Sunday at 2 P M., in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, to put the finishing touches to the preparations. The distinguished prisoner was liberated and among us, so we were sure of somebody for the Reception to receive. We adjourned to meet at seven in Chickering Hall. This present note maker approached the hall at ten minutes past seven. As he turned out of 14th street up 5th avenue, and saw the crowd, at that early moment, streaming into Chickering Hall from every direction, all doubts vanished, and a light heart, and lighter heels hurried him forward. In the vestibule he was surrounded by eager applicants for reserved seats. Having a few tickets left on purpose for late comers, he soon emptied his pockets, and then pushed on through the crowd to the waiting room by the stage. Hundreds were already seated though only a single gas jet relieved the dimness. In ten minutes more the hall was full. By twenty minutes to eight it was jammed—not another nose could wedge its way in, and many hundreds were turned away. It was a magnificent audience—orderly, attentive, intelligent. Also it was demonstrative, and well knew how to cheer in the right places.

At fifteen minutes to eight our honored veteran, Elizur Wright, took the chair. As for the rest, is it not all put down in the reporter's notes published in last week's TRUTH SEEKER? This note-maker is making notes of what the other one did not, and could not, put down.

TWO SURPRISES.

Two events of the past year, occurring in connection with Mr. Bennett's imprisonment, hav most agreeably surprised the Liberals of this country—two developments hav revealed to them their strength. One was the unexampled number of 200,000 names signed to the petition for pardon. The other is this enthusiastic gathering in such numbers in Chickering Hall, together with the co-operating meetings and the letters and telegrams connecting them and making them one united mass meeting over the whole republic. This meeting takes our measure in New York, and shows us what we can do when protest and indignation against any outrage are called for. We need never more hesitate, or falter, or take counsel of our fears.

THE TELEGRAMS.

These began coming in even before the meeting was called to order. They were a very animating feature of the occasion, as they were read from time to time, sandwiched in between the speeches. The last one came about ten o'clock, from Fort Scott, Kansas, and, sent as it was from such a far western point, it was received with hearty cheers and a special welcome. The ground covered by these telegrams, from the outermost points of Massachusetts, South Carolina, Iowa, and Kansas, includes a very fair representative portion of this Union, and the two telegrams from Canada, extended our "Dominion," and received a specially warm welcome. All the telegrams were worth many times their cost, and the senders of them may hav the satisfaction of knowing that they contributed materially to the effect and success of the occasion.

Mr. W. F. Jamieson also may be assured that his brief but admirable letter received hearty rounds of applause as it was read to the audience.

THE TRAIL OF THE SERPENT.

It is the well settled policy of the Christian press to denounce every public meeting that Liberals hold as immoral and obscene, no matter how orderly, or how carefully expressed the speeches are. The annual Congress of the Liberal League at Syracuse was denounced by the press all over the country as obscene, and as defending obscenity, although not an obscene word was uttered there except by the Christian priest, Gordon, who straggled into the convention to defend Abbot. The annual Congress at Cincinnati last year was denounced still more and worse, as obscene, and as clamoring for the circulation of obscene literature through the mails, although no such claim was made, and not a word of obscenity was uttered there. In the same way this Bennett Reception was reported as "the most obscene meeting ever held where ladies attended." The only ground for it was that Mr. Heywood in his brief speech rather warmly defended his "Cupid's Yokes" as not obscene, and as being prosecuted because it conveyed "physiological information." The Liberals of this country may as well make up their minds that for a few years to come, whatever they do or don't do, they will be visited with this kind of lying, detraction, and abuse from the popular, capitalistic, and theologic press, and resolve to endure these lies with what patience, philosophy, and equanimity they may. Meantime our own presses are increasing, and our Leagues are spreading. With these and with pamphleteering and the rostrum, we can nail some of their lies. We are the growing conquering party, and in good time our turn will come.

DON'T WANT TO BE HIS MOTHER.

The one best special point that was made by any speaker at the Reception was brought out by Lucy Colman. No report of the mere words can do justice to the artistic way in which she commenced her appeal to mothers, and worked up to the terrible conclusion, "What kind of a feeling would come over you, any one of you, were you the mother of Anthony Comstock?" The audience at first shrank back in amazement, then recovering itself burst into the most tumultuous applause. Amelia Colby also made a magnificent speech. Her inventory of the favors and blessings, divine or otherwise, showered upon the United States and no "God in the Constitution," was uttered with telling effect. Her manner, and matter, and splendid voice justified all the expectations that had been formed of her, entirely new as she was to a New York audience. In short, the two lady speakers did excellent credit to themselves and to the occasion.

There were some calls for Colonel Ingersoll. One gentleman rose in the audience and said: "Only one thing is lacking to make this meeting a complete success. Where is Col. Ingersoll? Where is the missing link?" Well Col. Ingersoll was cordially invited; but he replied that his lecturing engagements would not permit. There is one compensation however for his absence. It shows that this great audience came together on the merits of the case, to vindicate a principle and to do honor and justice to the man who has been sacrificed in defense of it. We now know that New York Liberals are independent of noted leaders, great orators, famous names. With the Colonel present it would hav been said, and we ourselves would hav believed, that this great audience assembled to hear Ingersoll. We would hav known his strength but not our own.

But there is one Liberal worker and organizer and speaker very nearly or quite the peer of Col. Ingersoll whom we hav always with us in New York. Upon T. B. Wakeman we can always rely for an effort that will make any enterprise a success. He is a lawyer, like Col. Ingersoll, a ready off-hand speaker like him, keen-witted and humorous like him, though perhaps not rollicking, bubbling over and communicative of the contagion of fun, like him, less limited in his philanthropies, more logical, more deeply studied in the Constitution and laws of the United States, more absolutely certain of what is and what is not permissible under them—Mr. Wakeman fills the bill of every demand that Liberalism can make upon him. These two stars do indeed differ in glory; but Mr. Wakeman is none the less one of the first magnitude; and, as the years go on, and the emergencies of Liberalism accumulate, and the battle waxes hotter and hotter, the country will know T. B. Wakeman more and more, and appreciate him better and better. The place for such talents as his is upon the stump, the platform, the rostrum—anywhere and everywhere in the field—not in a Nassau street law office, nor at the bar where there are 4 000 inferior and competing law hacks to do the work to which fate has so far assigned him for the mere purpose of getting a living. I ask the Liberals of the United States next fall and winter to giv him such a call to their Leagues and Lyceums as will take him out of the law limbo, in which he is now wasting most valuable energy. If they could hav heard the most admirable speech with which, after Mr. Wright, he opened the Receptions, and seen the touching and graceful way in which he led forward Mr. Bennett, and introduced him to the audience, they would hav had one of the proofs and experienced one of the situations which justify all I hav said of him.

WHAT THE RECEPTION HAS ACCOMPLISHED.

It shook the Liberal fist under the noses of Comstock, Crosby, Colgate, Benedict, and all their set and defied them to continue their prosecutions. It proclaimed to them that it wont pay to imprison editors who are indorsed and welcomed by the best thought and intelligence in the ablest heads and hearts of the men and women of this country, overflowing into Paine, Science, Faneuil, and Chickering Halls. Such proceedings, on both hands, will go far to open the eyes of patriots and re-arouse the spirit of '76. When that takes universal place, more moth will creep over unused pews, more rust and dust will settle down upon unpounded pulpits and the people in all their intellects will be free.

WE hav already received very flattering notices of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," and which cannot appear in this issue for want of room. Those who wish the work will do well to send in their orders at once, as Volume I. is out and Volume II. will follow in a few weeks. The work is giving full satisfaction where it is received. We are not afraid to guarantee it. Remember, we are offering the two large volumes at $5, which is cheaper than any books of the kind in the market. Those who remit $3 for Volume I. will be entitled to Volume II. for $2. Wanted—five hundred orders within thirty days.

WE hav to announce that friend Samuel P. Putnam has returned to this city from the West, where he has been sojourning, and dispensing the words of truth for nearly a year past. He proposes to remain some little time in the city, devoting himself to literary work and speaking from the Liberal platform, as occasion may arise. He is in very good health.

MRS. A. H. COLBY and Olive K. Smith hav been engaged to occupy the rostrum in Odd Fellows' Temple, Rochester, N. Y., during the months of May and June. During the past month their audiences hav increased until the large and commodious hall was filled to overflowing. Parties desiring their services for week evening lectures can secure them by addressing them accordingly.

Financial.

Discussion of the National Financial System.

BETWEEN DR. H. H. MORRISON AND JOHN W. TRUESDELL.

MR. TRUESDELL'S FIFTH LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Recognizing the principle that one error begets another; that one mistake in any mathematical problem will always lead to innumerable greater ones, which in turn can only be covered up by repeated falsification of figures, my opponent in his fifth letter again rushes into print with a new "fiat" bank statement exhibiting as usual but a part of one side of the ledger. He tells us that the national banks in 1878 were drawing interest upon one billion two hundred and seventy-six million dollars, while their real capital was but a trifle over two hundred and seventy-five millions. To make up this remarkable combination of figures he turns to page twelve, part second, of the comptroller's report for 1878, and from one side of the ledger alone, under the October statements, from a column of figures amounting in the aggregate to over one billion seven hundred and sixty-seven millions he copys the first four charges; and drawing a line at that point he presents the footings as a basis for estimating the earnings of the national banks as compared with their capital—declaring the former to be more than four times the amount of their real capital. Why he has stopped at this point, when there are so many other large interest-bearing charges in the same column, which he could with the same propriety hav added to his statement does not appear; unless it be his fear of overdoing the matter.

Now, my friend Morrison, if you could be induced to abandon your new "fiat" system long enough to make up even one side of your ledger correctly, I would volunteer to introduce you to the other side, where I guarantee we will find credits enough to offset nearly four-fifths of these extravagant charges.

I was charitable enough in my last letter to slyly intimate that you did not know better than to pervert bank statistics in the manner you hav, but now I withdraw that apology, for I firmly believe you do. If I was employed by you, Mr. Morrison, as a bookkeeper, and I should draw off from your books the major portion of your gross charges against your customers, and without deducting the cost of your stock, your salaries paid to assistants, your taxes upon the business, your interest paid upon borrowed capital (deposits), your bad debts, your rents, your losses, your fuel, your lights, your time, nor any other item of expense, and if I should publish these few garbled charges as a fair statement of your income, I do not believe you would call me a candid man nor even an honest one, but this is precisely what you do in figuring upon the receipts of the national banks. Why sir, by this "fiat" system of bookkeeping you could go into most any of our wholesale mercantile houses and get rich before breakfast. But, sir, the "fiat" system will not work in practice; and no one is better aware of the fact than a majority of those who advocate it.

Your statements will deceive but a very few. People read and figure for themselves. Those who are interested enough to consult official documents will at once discover that your national bank statements are a tissue of misrepresentations from beginning to end. You hav assumed at the commencement of this discussion that the national banks derive a net income of over fifty per cent per annum upon their real capital, and despite of abundant positive official proof to the contrary you stick to that assumption; what earthly object you hav I cannot conceive. If interest is a fraud "and a legal steal," as you claim it to be, is not the principle as bad for the banks to steal eleven per cent per annum out of the people as to steal a greater sum? I am quite willing to acknowledge that during the year ending September 1, 1873, the national banks did make a net gain of 10 87 per cent upon their capital and surplus, and in 1878 their net earnings as compared to capital and surplus were but 5.14 per cent. The banks acknowledge these amounts in their sworn statements and the comptroller corroborates their reports. If your theory in regard to interest is correct, surely here is abundant evidence for conviction without distorting the facts. The banks confess the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. And why do you persistently weaken your case and disgust your friends by continually misrepresenting the amount?

In making up your wild and often ludicrous statements you quote freely from the report of the comptroller; but when the glaring fact is exhibited to our readers that your conclusions differ widely from his, you immediately repudiate your own witness, declaring that "the comptroller's every argument is in the interest of the national system," intimating that I should be discredited because he is my guide.

Now, Mr. Morrison, do be honest; do be consistent, if you can. The comptroller is right or he is wrong. If he is a political trickster, perverting statistics in his official reports, it is time the people found it out, and you will deserve the everlasting gratitude of the community for exposing him. But if the comptroller is right, as ninety-nine in one hundred even of his political opponents believe him to be, you hav no moral right to distort his figures nor dispute his statistics.

If you really believe the banking business to be so very lucrative, Mr. Morrison, allow me to ask you why you stick to the profession of dentistry when the national bank system is free to all who wish to engage in the business? Do not say you are too poor, for, according to your own theory, it requires but a very small sum to start a national bank. I know nothing of your financial standing, but I will venture to guess you might raise at least $1,000, and associate with yourself four or five other men with a like amount, making in all say five or six thousand dollars. You can then easily hire some responsible broker (not a cutthroat) for a small commission to purchase $50,000 in government bonds for your bank, the broker will send the bonds to Washington, get your charter, and $45,000 in national bank currency. You can then sign the bills as cashier, and another stockholder as president, and pay off your broker with the currency. After engaging a competent "fiat" bookkeeper, you will then be ready for business; and as you can make, according to your own statements, over fifty per cent per annum upon your real capital, your currency costing, as you say, but one per cent per annum, in two years you will be out of debt—a capitalist, a banker, and a "bloated bondholder."

If you, Mr. Morrison, really believed in the financial principles which you advocate, and that the charges which you make against the national banks are true, I am confident you would pocket your conscience and immediately engage in the business.

In the vain effort to prove your wild statements, and to make it appear that the banks are earning four or five times as much as they really are, you cite two cases where the banks are lending largely in excess of their capital. But what does this prove? Nothing, unless you tell us how much they pay for the deposit which they lend in excess of their capital, together with all other expenses. Why, sir, if you wish to make a "fiat" statement of a single bank, take the Chemical National Bank of New York, with a capital of only $300,000, and a surplus of over one million, and individual profits over two millions, bills discounted over eight and one-half millions.

Now, to complete this "fiat" work, suppress the fact that the great bulk of these profits were made long before this bank reorganized into a national bank, lead your readers to infer that the bank pays nothing for eleven and one-half millions of deposits, and state emphatically that the bank made the major portion of their profits out of their currency, which "cost them but one per cent per annum," and by all means withhold the fact that every dollar of this currency has long since been cancelled and destroyed wholly because it did not pay. A good "fiat" statement could be made for the Metropolitan National Bank of New York, but it has just been made public that the directors of the bank hav voluntarily reduced their circulation during the last few months from $2,330,000 to $45,000, because they found it cost them in taxes and other expenses more than it was worth to them.

A great many national banks can be named having no surplus at all, and many others that hav not been able to declare a dividend from their profits during the last four or five years. From these cases we might present another side to the picture, which would be as unjust to the whole national system as your remarkable statements hav been.

For the purpose of showing those who do not hav access to official reports how utterly inconsistent, how unfair, and even ridiculous your statements will appear in the light of facts, I herewith present the following table, taken from the Comptroller's Official Report to Congress for the year 1879, page 43, part first, rhowing the entire capital, surplus, and total net earnings of all the national banks in the United States and territories for each half year, extending over a period of ten and one-half years, ending September 1, 1879, together with the ratio of net earnings to capital and surplus:

From the foregoing official figures it appears that the average net profits made by the national banks upon capital and surplus during the past ten years is but 8.13 per cent per annum. The largest annual gain being 11.81 per cent for the year ending March 1, 1870, while the average net earnings for the three years ending Sept. 1, 1879, was but 5.42 per cent.

Since the repeal of the law limiting the national currency to $354,000,000 by act of Congress, Jan. 14, 1875, the volume has not been increased as it certainly would hav been were it one-half as profitable as you represent; but the amount in circulation has steadily declined until just previous to Jan. 1, 1879, when, stimulated by an assurance of the resumption of specie payments and consequently a general revival in business, bankers slightly increased their issues. The amount in circulation, to-day, however, is far below that of 1875.

The reader will observe that since the system became free the total national banking capital has also declined by over $40,000,000, while their surplus account has been reduced by losses and dividends not earned to the extent of more than $16,000,000 In attempting to analyze that national system of banking much confusion naturally arises among amateurs in consequence of a general belief that the total reserve fund now charged to the banks was earned under the national system, but this opinion is not correct. When the national bank law first took effect but very few of the state banks accepted the situation. Under the new system no bank was allowed to make a dividend until they had earned and carried to surplus account at least ten per cent upon the capital stock. Early in 1865, however, when the proposition was first raised to tax state circulation out of existence, there was a general change among the old state banks, a large majority of them reorganizing as national banks and carrying to the new system their old surplus account, together with their entire undivided profits. This action on the part of the state banks enabled them in most cases to declare dividends as fast as they earned them.

The annual net profits as exhibited above show accurately the entire earnings of capital and surplus after deducting all costs and expenses.

SAFETY OF NATIONAL BANK CURRENCY.

You ask me, in substance, if the greenbacks are not just a little safer than our present national bank notes. In reply let me say emphatically, No! If there is any difference in the safety of the two currencies to the holders, it is most assuredly in favor of the national banks. First, the national bank currency has all of the security of the greenbacks, being first issued by the government and indorsed by it, the government holding collaterals largely in excess of the amount in circulation. Second. The national banks hold a large amount of specie in their vaults, and with their reserve agents for the express purpose of redeeming their bills. Third. Every national bank stockholder is held personally responsible to the bill-holders for twice the amount of his stock, and in no case is a national bank allowed to issue currency in excess of their capital stock. So far as regards safety, our national bank currency is far superior to anything that has ever before been issued in the shape of paper money. Our national system of banking is the best we hav ever had, it is the admiration of the whole financial world, and until you, Mr. Morrison, can present us with a better one, you had better cease your senseless ravings.

TAXING GOVERNMENT BONDS.

Among all of the illogical schemes advanced by the fiat money advocates none appear more ridiculous and untenable than the proposition to tax the government upon her own credit. The government rate of interest during the last fifteen years has ruled far below the average rate paid upon other obligations simply because her debts were exempt from taxation. To-day the prevaling rate of interest throughout the United States will probably average above six per cent, while the government can borrow an abundance of capital at four. If we should violate our present contract with the people and impose a tax upon all existing government bonds a temporary advantage might appear, but the funding process at the present low rate of interest would immediately cease, and the rate upon all future government loans would advance just in proportion to the tax imposed, therefore, by virtue of this non-taxable clause the government does in effect collect or withhold from the bondholders a tax in advance, fully equal to that imposed upon other kinds of personal property. The greenback proposition to hire an extra army of tax gatherers to collect for the government a tax levied directly upon the government, either by impairing her credit or taxing her public buildings, is as absurd as it would be for an individual to tax himself for his own benefit and employ a number of expensive clerks to do the work.

All these ridiculous schemes are but a fair sample of the "fiat" system of finance; and I am surprised, Mr. Morrison, that any intelligent person should advocate such nonsense.

I will now answer one more of your strange charges against our banking system, which I had overlooked, and then draw this letter to a close, as I hav already exceeded my allotted space. You claim that the national banks purchased aboat four hundred and ten millions of government bonds at forty-eight cents on the dollar. This statement I deny. The great bulk our government loans, including all of the "seven-thirties," the "five-twenties," and the "ten-forty" bonds, were placed upon the market at par, the government realizing on the average within one per cent of their face value. True, the government received in exchange for the bonds her own demand, obligations (greenbacks) which were often sold by individuals at a discount for gold; but as these greenbacks had been paid out by the government to her soldiers, her sailors, and other subjects, at par, certainly there could be no injustice in her redeeming them at the same nominal price. If the greenbacks fell in value, as measured by the world's standard, surely this was not the fault of those who were so unfortunate as to hold her promises.

Now, Mr. Morrison, as your next letter is to be your last in this discussion, do try and redeem yourself. There is room enough in three or four columns to introduce something logical. I do sincerely hope before you close this discussion you will advance just one little, sensible, practical, financial idea, and thus save yourself from an ignominious failure.

JOHN W. TRUESDELL.

Syracuse, N. Y., April 18, 1880.

A Card to the Liberals of the World.

I herewith tender my congratulations on the grand and splendid success of the Bennett Reception, send greetings to them, and mingle my joy with theirs.

Also I desire to publicly thank those members of the Reception Committee who gave freely their time, attention, and unsparing effort, as well as means, to make a certainty of the good work that now gives promise of a new lease of liberty to America.

I thank them also for their kind aid and co-operation, and their assistance where my inexperience needed their good counsel to direct.

Without wishing to draw comparisons, I thank Theron C. Leland, Committee on Advertising, for his masterly work in handling the public press, advertising, etc., to which much of our success was due. To Drs. E. B. Foote, Sr. and Jr., who started the movement and provided a home for the Committee, much is due; and the other members of the Committee, Prof. Rawson, H. B. Brown, Chamberlain, Ryman, Lockwood, Macdonald, Searing, and others, hav the happiness of seeing their great efforts amply rewarded.

To the noble-hearted men and women who at the sacrifice of time and means came from a distance, to the aged in years and the championship of liberty, who honored the third great uprising for human rights by their presence, I return my thanks as a Liberal.

Very respecfully, DANIEL E. RYAN,
Chairman Reception Committee.

A Few Words to a Spiritual Correspondent.

"I hav just read your criticism on Mr. Chapman's article on Spiritualism. As I hav always read all of your articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER for the past two and a half years, and I always admire your grand and noble utterances, I cannot help thinking that your pen may be inspired, although all unconscious to yourself, to say many of the grand and noble things that you enunciate. But I am happy in the thought that I cannot believe in the blank and cold Materialism of which you so feelingly speak. For me, it has nothing but dread and horror. If I had to believe that I should cease to hav a conscious existence after this life; I should feel to curse the day that I was born. No; I would rather believe in the literal orthodox hell and that I was destined to go there after this life was ended than to believe in extinction and annihilation, or even unconscious sleep or dream. F. F. F."

Yes, my friend, I feel that I am "inspired" to speak plain common-sense truths; inspired to teach the real value of facts and realities as contrasted with myth and fable; inspired to show to the dreamer and builder of air-castles the superior excellence of mansions on earth, in which true, happy, and earnest lives may be lived, and not merely fancied or possible in some imaginary, inconceivable future; inspired to prove that Materialism is not "cold and blank," but full of warm, living, glowing light, heat, and beauty. We are born, we liv, we grow, we mature, and then pass on into the rich, ripe, and full harvest of old age. We taste of all the joys and blisses of the passing years; we love, learn, and experience, and, when the fullness of age comes upon us, we are usually ready and willing to sleep the long, last sleep that knows no waking. There are few who, at the very last, think or care whether there is a future or not. Sleep, rest, peace, is all they ask. Now and then one who dies in the full vigor of life and strength, when he has not lived one-half his years, looks longingly for another existence in which to liv out the rest of the experiences he should hav had here. But remember these are not cases to judge by. A true life is complete from infancy to age, and ends as naturally as any other complete existence. It needs no continuation or revival in a supposable future world, for it is whole, finished, and done.

It is time, my friend, that the world should cease dreaming and go to work. "I'll be good and happy by and by" is robbing our race of its vast and boundless capacities for happiness here and now to an extent that few of us realize. Instead of dreaming of the maybe, we should work and labor in the now. We should make life in its daily and hourly passage bright and beautiful with good thoughts and good deeds. I see no "dread and horror" in annihilation for myself and friends any more than there is in the death of a tree, plant, or flower. We enjoy them while they are ours, and, when gone, we hav pleasant memories of them as treasures once ours, but now forever a portion of the years we hav left behind us. As well long for the babyhood of our brief existence to come back to us as for ourselves to begin again in a life to come. We hav lived our days, and not one step of them all can we retrace or liv again.

There is something I cannot understand in Spiritualism; something that may yet add greatly to the happiness, the progress, the development, and possibilities of earth's inhabitants here on earth, but I see no proof of anything that reaches out to us from any existence that has once ended here. The believers in this ism tell us now and then of some one being saved from impending danger through spirit agency, just as the pious hav always told us of special providence and answered prayers. But I think all things that are, are legitimate effects of natural causes, some not yet understood, but none the less free from supernatural agencies and spirit influences.

But when thee says thee "would rather believe in the literal orthodox hell and that thee was destined to go there than to believe in Materialism," I must think thee fails to realize what hell—an orthodox hell—really is. Canst think of thyself as

> Like a cinder that had life and feeling?
> Seamed his face with inward pining to be what
> He could not be. As being that had burned
> Continually in slow, consuming fire
> Half an eternity and was to burn
> Forever more. . . .
> Oh, sight to be forgotten! Thought too horrible to think!"

Remember it is not the hell the good Gottlieb describes, where one can wander off beyond the "ever-burning lake" and build up a nice little heaven out of pure, good men, but a real "orthodox hell" thee wished in place of sleep, rest, and annihilation; a hell where there is only fire and anguish unutterable forever and forever;

> "Where utter nothing dwells, unformed and void.
> There neither eye, nor ear, nor any sense
> Of being most acute finds object. There,
> For aught external, still you search in vain."

Yes, sights most horrid greet the eye;

> "Of worm, or serpent kind, it something looked,
> But monstrous, with a thousand snaky heads.
> Eyed each with double orbs of glaring wrath.
> And with as many tails, that twisted out
> In horrid revolution, tipped with stings.
> And all its mouths, that wide and darkly gaped
> And breathed most poisonous breath, had each a sting.
> Forked and long, and venomous and sharp;
> And in its writhings infinite it grasped
> Malignantly what seemed a heart, swollen black,
> And quivering with torture most intense;
> And still the heart, with anguish throbbing high,
> Made effort to escape, but could not; for > Howe'r it turned, and oft it vainly turned,
> These complicated foldings held it fast.
> And still the monstrous beast, with sting of head
> Or tail, transpierced it, bleeding evermore."

Call'st thou sweet, silent, quiet, everlasting rest, "horror and dread," after this one glimpse of one little corner of the "orthodox hell?" Yet were all this, and a trillion times more, realized by thee for just two minutes in that dire abode, how quickly would thee call out for death's merciful dart to end thee forever and shut out sense and feeling from thee forevermore! Yet, after all, it is not what we desire, wish, or long for that must be, but what is, and so let us think, study, and learn. Let us explore the vast arcana of nature, and seek her truths, and profit by the lessons of the past and the present, and build truly as we go.

> "Not in indolence shall man advance,
> But by his own endeavor, power, and glance;
> By character; by labor's changeful zest;
> By all his being struggling for the best."

Resolutions of the St. Joseph Liberal League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: At the regular meeting of the St. Joseph Liberal League, held this Sunday afternoon, at the Court House, the inclosed resolutions were unanimously adopted, and all expressed great satisfaction that the time is drawing so near when you will walk again among your friends and fellow-men, in the opening beauties of spring, with expanding buds and fragrant flowers. All good men and women, and nature too, will welcome you as one who has suffered so nobly and grandly for the cause of truth and the welfare of man, woman, and child. I thank you a thousand times o'er and o'er for the impetus you hav given the cause of Freethought, not only in America but throughout the world.

Please send me twenty-five copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing these resolutions.

Yours, P. V. WISE.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ST. JOSEPH, MO.

The following resolutions were adopted by Auxiliary Liberal League No. 16, of St. Joseph, Mo., on the occasion of the release of D. M. Bennett from the injustice and despotism of the Christian prison at Albany, New York, to light and Infidel freedom:

WHEREAS, Through fraud and deception, that tool of the priests, A. Comstock, procured the passage of that unconstitutional act through the Congress of the United States known as the obscene Comstock postal law, by means of which he is given espionage over the postal or mail service of the United States; and

WHEREAS, This despotic, bigoted, false-hearted, and perjured Comstock, by lying and deception, procured Mr. Bennett's arrest, and then through corruption an indictment was found against him, and a mock trial was had before a tool of the church, a worse than the Star Chamber of a Scroggs or Jefferies, in the person of the bigoted Benedict of the United States court, and a packed orthodox jury, this brave man was convicted, nominally of having sold a small pamphlet, published by E. H. Heywood, discussing in a philosophical, dry, argumentative manner the laws and relations of the marriage system, but in fact for having published THE TRUTH SEEKER and many pamphlets and books exposing the frauds, corruptions, falsehoods, intolerance, despotism, and myriad wrongs committed in the name and for the benefit of the Christian church; and incarcerated him in a loathsome prison at Albany, in the great state of New York, where he has been confined at hard labor since July last among Christian prisoners who hav committed the worst crimes in the whole catalogue; and

WHEREAS, Mr. Bennett, instead of bowing and cringing to the Moloch of the church and his unprincipled persecutors, has manfully defied them and persistently fought them hour by hour, day by day, week after week, and month after month, never yielding one iota, but becoming more intensified and determined as his imprisonment lengthened and the conflict progressed, working as no man ever worked before, unless it was Thomas Paine, the creator of this government; yes, worked every spare moment in writing letters and books, all devoted to furthering the cause of humanity and freedom, and opposing the frauds, cruelties, falsehoods, iniquities, injustice, and corruption of the church, in a bold, fearless manner, not excelled by any martyr in ancient or modern times; therefore,

Resolved, That this League hereby expresses its earnest approval of the course pursued by Mr. Bennett, and in the name of truth, justice, and humanity, heartily thank him for his perseverance, indomitable will, and courage in his great battle for the cause of justice and human freedom.

Resolved, That, as the brave Jackson declared, the Constitution of the United States, free speech, free press, free mails, and freedom to the humblest citizen must and shall be preserved at all hazards, though every church crumble and every religion be blotted from the memory of man.

Resolved, That the cowardly assault made by the unprincipled, bigoted, selfish, tyrannical, perjured A. Comstock, aided and abetted by Crosby, Colgate, Benedict, and the church, upon free speech, free thought, and the freedom of the press, in the illegal and unconstitutional proceedings taken against D. M. Bennett, and his unjust and illegal imprisonment, has been bravely and unflinchingly repelled, and the cause of human liberty, free speech, and a free press been nobly vindicated by D. M. Bennett, America's second martyr.

Resolved, That D. M. Bennett has by his courage and unswerving conduct as an upright, honest man, who has devoted his time, liberty, and life-long energies to the cause of freedom and humanity, deserved the unqualified meed of praise, and the love of every true man and woman in the universe.

Resolved, That we hereby extend to D. M. Bennett a warm, hearty, and earnest welcome to sunlight, liberty, his family, and the bosom of his hosts of friends; congratulating him on his release from what his persecutors and the church intended should be his tomb. And be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Bennett's bold, fearless, and uncompromising newspaper, for publication.

Nana and Comstock.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The city press calls upon Comstock to suppress Emile Zola's last book. It is, indeed, a glaring and graphic exhibition of the career of a child of sin—its pen-picture of licentiousness, depravity, is nakedly truthful and given with all "the brutal justice of a photograph." In giving the disgusting delineations of such a character as Nana, the author fulfils his declared design of painting that class of creatures as they exist in real life, and in doing so strips from vice the glamorous veil with which the genius of such writers as Lytton and Dumas had invested it. He dispels that charm of corruption so alluring to imaginative youth, and depicts with cold and clear precision the development from the dunghill of degradation of a human poisonous flower whose fragrance was frittered fortunes and ruined men. Nana cannot prove a pleasing or even an interesting volume to any class of readers. Its every page is a protest and a warning. It is a terrible tale, tersely told, of the triumphal vault of a variety Venus from the gutter up to the gaudy throne of a Cyprian goddess, of her brief reign in the empire of evil, and how she blasted and burnt all before her like a breathing upas; then of her precipitate plunge down the precipice of pleasure, crushing beneath her cursed chariot wheels, like a juggernaut of lust, the hopes and hearts, the homes and bleeding bodies of her duped devotees. It is the tale of a Venus transformed into a vampire, preying upon the peace and life of her long procession of vice made up of all classes of men from paupers to princes. At last she is left with the reader upon her deserted bed of death, her baleful beauty melted into an unrecognizable mass of smallpox pustules. Venus lies there alone, a shovelful of filthy flesh, decomposed by the virus of vice with which she has poisoned a people. No more complete disillusion of the seductiveness of sin could be conceived.

No person can rise from a perusal of Nana without feeling his heart haunted by a lasting loathing for the terrible traffic in the purity of woman. It brings him face to face with the fearful featured Mokanna behind the veil, and furnishes him that familiarity with unchastity which breeds contempt. The surest way to suppress vice is to render it repulsive, to display it in its unadorned deformity. The mischief a book does to morals in this direction should be measured by its influence in arousing the amorous impulses of the young. Judged by this criterion, the insidious Songs of Solomon hav contributed more to spread the seeds of sensuality than all the bawdy books ever put in print. The "Sweet Singer of Israel" arrays his voluptuous heroine in all the attractive attire of the oriental princess. Emile Zola gives his the garb of the Parisian gutter.

If that Barnum of bawdy show business, Comstock, possesses pictures which invests vice with the sly suggestions of art for the purpose of firing the youthful imagination, then is his pious parade of them pernicious and should be speedily stopped, at least among the parsons of all other classes. But if, like Nana, they tend to depict the visage of vice in its real disgusting ugliness, and serve to sicken the spectator the more he sees of them, then the more exhibiting Comstocks there are the better will it be for morality.

To further illustrate, the New York Witness throws around this post-office sneak the lustrous livery of religion, and holds him up to an applauding public. No one can determine the deleterious effect this has had in inoculating combative commission clerks with the ambitious idea of abandoning an honest employment to become renowned carrion hunters like the far-famed Anthony. THE TRUTH SEEKER tears off the counterfeit covering of his hideous hypocrisy and reveals the wretched rascal. As such he ceases to be the paragon of the post-office and the church, the cynosure of combative commission clerks. That is precisely what Emile Zola has done in Nana with prostitution.

S. H. PRESTON.

I AM pleased to learn that the bill before the New York state Legislature, taxing church property, was defeated. The bill was a fraud. It did not represent the wishes of the Liberals of the state, for it only provided for taxing the property of a church over and above the amount of $10,000. We want no such hybrid law as that on the statute books. If it is right to exempt church property, it should all be exempted. If it is not right, then no such property should be exempted. Liberals in this country are not fighting merely to save a few dollars in taxes, but for a principle. The question is, "Has the state the right to maintain sectarian institutions at the expense of the people? There was one good provision in the bill. It provided for the taxation of ministers and priests. But the ministers and priests observed this provision and united in a strong effort to prevent its passage, and succeeded. They were not willing to pay their honest taxes like other persons, but desired to remain a pauper class, living on other people's earnings. But such injustice cannot always remain unrepealed. Next year we must commence our work early. No Liberal should vote for a member of the Legislature who does not favor the total repeal of these unjust laws, and one hundred thousand names must be sent to our Legislature, asking that these obnoxious laws be repealed.

Letters from Friends.

WACONDA, KAN., May 4, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The Solomon Valley Liberal League commemorated the release of D. M. Bennett, on Sunday, the 21 inst., by a lecture from Mr. Solomon Carter, of Ashervile. Mr. Carter did the subject "Mind and Matter," justice in a new and impressive manner. After the lecture the business of the society was next in order. The congregation being invited to remain did so. One of our number, James Chapman, took his leave of the society for a journey in the mountains for several years, and donated to the society his books, as a commencement of a Liberal and scientific library. If no unforseen event shall befall us we shall hold the first annual meeting at Idlewild Grove, during the last week of August. We hav a grove second to none, and all that seems to be in the way are good speakers. These we hav not engaged, because we are not sufficiently acquainted to know to whom to apply.

GEO. W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., May 8, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND: With pleasure I inform you I am in receipt of your Book, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient Times," for which receive my sincere thanks. I shall want the second volume, and shall remit you in the course of a week or so.

Dear friend, you are once more permitted to breathe the free air of heaven, to which receive the ever fraternal welcome of one who regards you as the true savior of his mental life, for such exalted ideas of life as it should be, I never knew till I became acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor. "Thrice welcome, noble man!" is the congratulation of Yours in freedom, W. F. PORTER.

SARANAC, MICH., May 6, 1880

MR. EDITOR: Saturday evening, May 1st, Liberal League No. 129, telegraphed their greetings to the Bennett Reception, care of Elizur Wright, Chairman, Chickering Hall. Telegram was forwarded from here all right, yet was not delivered as intended on the following evening, and we cannot ascertain why. S. M. CRAWFORD, Sec.

WELLESLEY, MASS., May 8, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: Yours of May 6th containing card and check, duly received, together with the copy of your last work, written while in Albany Penitentiary. Many, very many, thanks, until you receive more substantial acknowledgment. When our courts make our prisons respectable by sending our best citizens there, where will be the terror for evil doers? It is still true that "the man makes the vocation, and not the vocation the man." Am glad there was so successful a demonstration on your return.

E. M. F. DENTON.

GRANITE HILL., CAL., April 28, 1880

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Knowing the friendship existing between yourself and my father, Adam Lohry, I deem it my duty to inform you of his death. Upon Monday evening, the 12th inst., he was missed from home, and upon a thorough search being made his tracks were found leading directly into the American River He has been suffering from dizziness and severe pains in the head for several weeks past, and we cannot believe otherwise than that in a fit of temporary insanity produced by brain suffering, he has committed this act. Every one was shocked by the news, as he has always appeared to possess an unusually strong constitution, and all believed him capable of battling his sickness to the end successfully. Search has been made, and rewards offered for the body, still upon this, the seventeenth day of his disappearance, no traces hav been found. Father has been a subscriber as well as a contributor to your paper, for some time, and I feel assured you will learn of his death with deep regret. Not only will he be mourned as husband, father, and friend, but as a valuable support to Liberalism, in which he was a firm believer, and to which he was a true friend.

He always expressed a deep desire to know more than he did of Spiritualism and the hereafter, and now will solve the mystery. I feel glad to know this idea of "believe or be damned" held no hold upon his mind, and am perfectly satisfied he met his death calmly and fearlessly, as only one can who lived the life he did—honorable, upright, and conscientious.

Yours respectfully, MRS. ANNA GALLANAN.

LOWELL, MICH.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Accept my sincere congratulations on your release. I trust your, and our, enemies will now see that persecution does not pay. Your worst enemies now are those contemptible sneaks of the Index and Journal Go right on with your glorious work. They are carting rubbish to their own doors. Your "little weakness" has been fully condoned and expunged, and now I should go right on treating them with the contempt they hav so richly earned. Here is my heart and my hand for all I am worth. Yours for truth, E. A. CHAPMAN.

SAGINAW CITY, MICH., May 3, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: As our A B C may be called the foundation of all intelligence and learning, so the firm of A., B., and C., might well be styled the foundation of everything that is mean, contemptible, dishonorable, and offensive. As the intelligent child rejoices when it gets out of its A B C's, so we rejoice that you are out of the clutches of the infamous A B C of modern society. As the youth advancing to the years of discernment and discretion thinks he sees a beautiful and glorious future stretched before him, so we hope and trust that the remaining years allotted to you may be full of joy, comfort, and happiness, and that your amiable, noble, and loving spouse may be spared to enjoy those privileges of life with you.

As you will again assume personal control and supervision of your paper, allow me to suggest that you petition his satanic majesty to renew his correspondence with you and giv us some more of those instructive and interesting letters he used to send, and which, if got up in book form, would be of inestimable value and a legacy to transmit to future generations. Again assuring you of my personal friendship,

I remain, THOS. L. JACKSON.

MT. PLEASANT, IOWA, May 2, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find money order for one dollar, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER. We send you greeting, our best wishes, and our congratulations for your deliverance from the clutches of a barbarian and persecuting religion. We are happy to say that in this grand, great West we hav no such witchcraft laws as are still found on the statute books of some of the Eastern states. In old Dutch Pennsylvania it seems to be a crime for an intelligent man like B. F. Underwood to lecture in a schoolhouse. I am ashamed to own the fact that I was born in that priest-ridden state, where the people must still believe in spooks and ghosts, with laws three hundred years behind the age in which we liv. But it will not always be so; gods and devils, ghosts and witches are dying fast, and men and women who have been born only once are healthy and prosperous. Yours for mental freedom, ANDREW GOAN.

BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH.

And now may victory, great peace, and loving kindness be and abide with D. M. Bennett, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all their friends, now and henceforth.

Yours ever, WORTHY PUTNAM.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 30, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In behalf of many who sympathize with you in the suffering inflicted upon you by the execution of an infamous sentence of imprisonment, without cause, and believing that an expression condemning the motives and actions of your persecutors is eminently your due at this moment, I hav great pleasure in assuring you of our unremitting respect and the kindest wishes for your welfare and success.

I am yours very respectfully, W. W. JACKSON.

ANGOLA, IND., April 26, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Another Liberal friend passed away on the 22d of March, 1880. Bro. James Pew, died at his residence in Scott township, Steuben Co., Ind., of that lingering disease, consumption, which he contracted while battling for the liberties of his country. He enlisted on the 8th of August 1862. Joined company H then organizing at Angola, which company was assigned to the 74th regiment Indiana volunteers; was mustered into the United States service on the 21st of the same month. He was elected a corporal of his company; he gradually rose from that position to that of orderly sergeant of his company, and on the 1st of May, 1865, received a commission as first lieutenant of his company from Governor O. P. Morton. As a soldier James was as brave as the bravest; always was ready for duty wherever duty called; in time of action cool and cheerful, not a word of complaint came from his lips no matter in what situation he was placed. He participated in the battles of Chicamauga, Missionary Ridge, Goldboro, and Dalton; was with Sherman at Atlanta and on his march to the sea, from Savannah, Ga., to Washington, D C., where he was finally mustered out of the service, as he was no longer required. During his long and protracted illness he often spoke of D M Bennett's incarceration and the conduct of President Hayes toward him. This, he says, was not the liberty which I fought for and am now about to giv up my life for. He was one of those Liberals who feared no angry God or burning hell, and made a request to his friends that after he was dead, not to hav any preaching at his funeral He was buried by the Masonic fraternity of which he was a member. The funeral took place at his residence, and the procession was the largest that was ever held in our county, reaching from a half to three quarters of a mile in length, headed by the Angola silver cornet band. He leaves a wife and two small children and a host of friends to mourn his loss. James was a good man and a respected citizen; he leaves not an enemy behind him, but all speak of him in the highest praise.

Very respectfully yours, W. T.

CIRCLEVILLE, OHIO, May 2, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: At the residence of C. E. Spears, this pleasant Sunday afternoon, I sit down to address a few lines to my dear old friend, D M. Bennett. This morning I read with great interest your "Tenth Letter from Albany." Rest assured, dear friend, my heart and deep sympathies hav been with you during your long weary weeks and months of unjust and cruel imprisonment. Although I believe that what is to be will be the inevitable result of things, regardless of any prayers we may offer to any man-made or imaginary deity, still, as I am in the habit of bowing my head in silent supplication to angels and superior intelligences (disembodied), I daily asked a blessing at their hands, to rest upon you and yours, that you might be sustained and comforted, and finally liv long to fight the great and glorious battles for freedom of speech, of the press, and of the mails, outgrowths of liberty of conscience, which all men should enjoy, but which, alas, it is, even in this boasted land of freedom, not yet permitted, only in silent thought, and beyond which if a man dares presume to go, wicked persecution is his lot.

If I was rich in the temporal things of this life, I would make a rattling among the dry bones of old orthodox religions; but, as I find myself situated, I feel it is wise not to meddle with poison carrion, and even to keep at proper distance from the dying lion, lest in its agony or death-struggles it may lacerate me fearfully.

Your remarks concerning Elder Ead's book I consider very needful and appropriate. As to Comstock and the whole boodle of your antichristian persecutors, I cannot think of anything mean and loathsome enough to compare them to, so I will leave you to giv them "L," as G. F. Train has it.

Now, dear friend, if there is any place I wish to be in more than any other, it is to be in New York city this evening and to attend the great Reception in honor of your release from unmerited martyrdom and hated prison life. I am sure you will hav a grand time. May the angels of liberty—as Paine, Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, etc.—be with you to-night, and all time in the future, to help you and to inspire you to battle for freedom.

I want the Liberals to nominate a candidate for the presidency; either yourself or Ingersoll, or some other good, fearless spirit. I think it is high time that right in these matters of government, instead of wrong and black corruption, should bear rule. I hope you will make a tour West and giv your thousands of friends a chance to see and hear you thunder forth the living truth. My dear Hattie joins me in love to you and Mary. E. D. BLAKEMAN.

DANSVILLE.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed find one dollar from an old friend in the cause of liberty and freedom. I hav lived long enough to see the evil effects of Christian bigotry and superstition; it is calculated to make men hypocrites every time. Men who believe that reason is carnal never use any. Respectfully, C. M. CREGO.

DOYLESTOWN, PA., April 18, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed pleased find one dollar for the Reception of D. M. Bennett from Christian bastile. Every Freethinker should contribute something. Let us make religious hypocrisy and bigotry odious.

THE TRUTH SEEKER sounds right every time. It does not handle superstition with gloves. I think Liberals should withdraw their support from the churches. Every cent given toward Christianity at this time, when they are trying to check Freethinkers, is giving aid to our foes. They now depend upon the almighty dollar to keep their machinery running, and they care but little how or where they get it.

Last Thursday night the Methodists of this place held a concert or jubilee. They hired an orchestra and some good-looking girls to sing. The sexton stood in the archway, and twenty-five cents paid the bill and passed you in.

I believe in taxing church property without limit. Why should they be exempt when there is anything held? In any one of them they think they will draw a crowd, they charge for it. I, living next door to this gospel mill, had the benefit of their racket without passing inside their lines. I can vouch that if that God they talk so much about did not hear every word uttered, it was because he had retired and given himself up to sleep and slumber.

A. J. READING.

CARROLLTON, ILL., April 27, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As it has been some time since I addressed you, I hav concluded to meet you (if not in person) with a small present on your arrival home after your very unjust imprisonment. I see you are expected home on the 29th, so I thought I would address this to you, thinking that you will arrive about the same time it does.

I had not seen an Index for nearly two years, until a short time ago I received one of the copies of the "5,000," marked "sample." Well, I was sorry to learn that you were so silly; but we are none of us perfect, and you hav made sufficient apology.

I hope you will reach home in good health and spirits and be able to conduct THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years to come.

I hav had some experiences with religion, not in myself, but in others. I find its effects worse than I expected. I hav no reason to wonder at what Col. Ingersoll said in regard to the religious creed: that if they were half as bad as their creed, he did not know what would become of us.

Well, in regard to the "5,000." I thought if that was a "sample" I had received, I had enough. It was false and deceitful. It showed more hatred and bad feeling than I liked to see. Inclosed please find post-office order for $5.

Long may you liv to continue your good work is the sincere wish of Your friend, WM. BLACK.

WHEELER HOLLOW, N. Y., April 26, 1880.

BROTHER D. M. BENNETT: Noble martyr of the present age, please accept the hearty congratulations of the undersigned on the decidedly marked event in your own and also the American history—your emancipation from Christian bondage. In our highest admiration, as a martyr of principle, we giv you the uppermost seat; and not far in the future, when truth and reason prevail, when Christian bigotry lies entombed in its own charnel-house, the name of D M. Bennett, our martyr-brother, will shine as an emblazoned star in night's sable canopy.

We would suggest the propriety of our present Chief Magistrate, or his Christian spouse, assembling two hundred or more visitors, young ladies and gentlemen, in a church, and from the rostrum read to them the prayers of Holy Writ, selected by you, as an antidote for poisoned virtue through "Cupid's Yokes." We would suggest the church doors be left open wide and the congregation permitted to escape when endurance from a modest standpoint is no longer possible.

A. B. WHEELER, A. T. WHEELER, B. F. WHEELER, H. B. LEONARD, G. B. LEONARD.

WALTON, IND., April 28, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear and Respected Friend: I exult in the thought that you will, on next Friday, be again a free man. I hav condoled with you in your troubles of a prison life. I hav done what I thought was my duty to help you in the advancement of truth and science. My sympathy for you in your imprisonment was sincere. I used industry to get signers to the petition for your release, but all was in vain.

I hope you, and all who participate in your Reception, will hav a grand and good time. I heartily wish I could be with you on the occasion; but I am like the bound boy at the husking—I hav got to stand in the rear. I cannot very well help myself. I hav lately made the discovery that the Christian thumbscrews are upon me. I now am aware of it.

My great desire is, and ever has been, to make an honorable living by honest industry. I hav made my mark in life in days now passed and gone. How the future will be with me remains to be seen.

I congratulate you on the bright future you hav before you. When you pass this life your name will go down to future generations as one of the greatest benefactors of the human race. Your sincere friend in the bonds of truth and science, D. ENGLER.

SALEM, NEB.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Liberals in this Western corner gave heed to the call of having a jubilee on the second day of May to express our sympathy and condolence with the thousands of Liberals in behalf of our teacher and friend D M. Bennett. We organized by electing H. B. Gist Chairman, and G. G. Weston Secretary. Lively and spirited speeches were delivered by Webster, Pierce, Dunning, and Gist.

The Committee on Resolutions, Webster, Brenigur, and Pierce, reported the following:

Resolved, That we assembled do most sincerely rejoice with our friends all over the United States that the true, tried, and honest Bennett is to-day enjoying his liberty.

Resolved, That we most indignantly condemn the court which convicted Mr. Bennett by violating our Constitution and trampling our liberty and infringing upon our most sacred rights.

Resolved, That in convicting Mr. Bennett the press has been chained, free thought imprisoned, the dictates of conscience mantled by usurpation.

Resolved, That we tender our sympathies and most hearty approval of Mr. Bennett's theory and conduct.

Resolved, That we wish the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER and with renewed vigor double our energy for its success; that the religious world may be brought into light and liberty.

After adjourning we enjoyed a splendid repast prepared by Esquire Brenigur and lady, which New York could be proud of. H. B. GIST, Chairman.

HARWICH, MASS., April 29, 1880

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Among the many interesting articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 20th there is one touching controversial correspondence. While other papers are so fastidiously close communion and exclusive in all matter that happens to differ from what is considered orthodox, how refreshing to find one that is not afraid to open its columns to a fair discussion.

That everlasting spirit of intolerance that characterizes the church of olden times seems to be the all-pervading element of Christianity, under some pretext or other, notwithstanding its loud profession of charity and good will to men. I do not see why any one should be unwilling for others to believe what seems to them best. Can we avoid believing or doubting? Are we responsible for what we cannot help? Is our belief a matter of choice? and if so, what folly to ignore evidence and smother conviction for fear of losing the old ruts of conservatism. They tell us we shouldn't hav known good from evil without the Bible. Fools! How did Confucius, Socrates, Plato, and a host of others of whom the world was not worthy, and of whom Jesus himself borrowed many of his wise sayings, know without it? Though we are imperfect, it does not follow that we are not as capable of judging of good and evil as were men of three thousand years ago.

If while in the midst of a desert I cannot tell my exact latitute and longitude, would it not be folly in me to blindly confide in the capacity of my fellow traveling companion who is in the same dilemma. Better unite our efforts and gather inferences and evidences for our mutual good, each one subjecting everything to the tribunal of his own judgment. Has the Great Spirit given one man reasoning powers that must lie dormant while others prescribe doctrines and creeds for him? Has he delegated A, B, and C, of the barbarous ages of antiquity, to put upon parchment a criterion by which we must be governed—interpolated, mistranslated, and mutilated as that document must necessarily hav been?

The Bible, they say, was given by inspiration. What of it? So was the Arabian Nights' Entertainment. But what is inspiration? In a physical sense it is breathing the air. In a figurative sense it is to be infused, animated, stimulated, either to do good or bad as the case may be, or to write truths or fiction. "All scripture was given by inspiration." That takes in good, bad, and indifferent, for what is scripture but writing or scribbling? But it is said it was given by inspiration of God. Then God is responsible for the whole, including that heterogeneous mass of nonsense, mixed with a little good sense, which we call the Bible.

The Christian idea is that there is a personal God somewhere—a grim-visaged idol—that likes to be sought into, that is pleased to hav people devote a portion of their time, more the better, in supplicating and flattering him, a God who is pleased with the shedding of blood. And some appear to think that self-torture will propitiate him and secure his good graces. Righteousness is nothing but "filthy rags." Piety is all that's needed. That other fellow will take care that no harm comes of sinning, for has not he atoned for us by shedding his own blood on the cross? And surely since it was innocent blood it has appeased the hot wrath of Jehovah.

The Christian idea of a personal God necessarily implies that he is a local being, and of course no one would think of locating him down underneath, but overhead, where they point and direct their prayers; and while James in Boston is pointing upward Jones in Australia, though pointing upwards, is pointing in an opposite direction. How much longer shall we hav such pretty-poll nonsense prated over the land, and that, too, at such enormous expense? I am amazed at the stupidity of some well-meaning people before whose eyes such trash has been vividly portrayed and the truth set forth in all its splendor and beauty, who yet turn a deaf ear to reason and return to the gurry and swill of unreasonable bigots.

Ah, Mr. Editor, it is a lack of honesty, too, on the part of some, and diamond cut diamond between honesty and the prejudice of education on the part of others, that prevents their liberation from the thraldom of superstition. But with all the deleterious influences of their religion there are some excellent people in the church, men and women of redeeming qualities, whose presence there is like honey in the carcass of a lion, as in the story of Samson, and whose business should be not tithing and minting but attending to some weightier matters of moral philosophy. What a pleasant world we might hav if the time spent in gratifying religious emotion by manipulating and mumbling over a certain set of religious and credal phrases was turned to the discussion of moral and scientific subjects. Christians, as a general thing, hav not given much real study to religion after all, it is only a vague idea they hav gathered from the catechism and the early drill, more from habit than anything else, which grows with their growth and in time becomes the prejudice of education.

I hav almost made this day a holiday. I swung the stars and stripes to the breeze and astonished the natives hereabouts, who made many inquiries. My answer was, "D. M. Bennett, whom Christianity had imprisoned for thirteen months, is to-day restored to liberty." B. F. ROBBINS.

GREAT VALLEY, N. Y., April 26, 1880:

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I see by the tag on my paper that the term paid for expired on the 15th of the present month, hence you will find inclosed $8, $3 to apply on the paper for another year and the balance to pay for the two volumes of the "Gods and Religions of the Ancients," which you will please send me as soon as ready. Please keep the books correct, since the excitement of D. M. Bennett's liberation will naturally tend to divert the thoughts from business pursuits.

And now, Mr. Editor and friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER office, I feel justified in giving his wholesome advice and precaution from the intense feeling personally experienced in my own case of a similar character to what you must all feel on the present occasion, the quality of which will be unnecessary to elucidate to you, my friends, or to any lover of free thought, free speech, and free mails. Hence you will excuse and accept as friendly and proper at the present time what would be officious and improper at other times.

Hoping you all feel happy in anticipation of so soon again as of old mingling in the personal and congenial presence of your old friend, D. M. Bennett and you can bet your last dollar that the writer of these lines would feel happy, more happy, could he be one to mingle and to add one more person to the throng that will meet in Chickering Hall on the 2d of May; but the fates will hardly permit so desirable a wish. So I think we must try and hav an indignation meeting at Bro. Green's or at some other good place, and let the friends at Chickering Hall know that we are in sympatny with them, and that our ecclesiastical brethren may know there are many gods in the form of men more just and wise than the Jehovah of the Jews.

BALTIMORE, MD.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I am sorry for you and for myself that my letter did not reach you. I inclose $1, 50 cents for a trial subscriber and 50 cents for my contribution to the Parton Fund. If I mistake not I is ill owe for two months more. I inclose another $1. I am so far away from the post-office that it did not seem worth while to go to register the letter, and so some of Comstock's friends are $1 better in purse. I am counting the days with you till Thursday comes. Rest assured Wednesday night will be a sleepless one to me and I shall long for the hour of freedom. I wrote to him also the day I wrote to you.

Well, my dear, blessed woman, I will not take your valuable time. I shall be in the city May 11th and 12th, and shall call and see you and your husband. You hav been so brave, so good, so womanly, so fearless in your own quiet manner that your name should go down to generations for moral courage and devotion. It will not be "the same a hundred years hence," that you and yours hav lived as it would hav been if you had all been less true to your highest convictions

Blessings and good wishes and kisses and congratulations from C. FANNIE ALLYN.

WEST AMBOY, N. Y., April 29, 1880.

DEAR BROTHER B.:

The time has come
When you can say, "I'm going home."
May all your fondest fancies yet
A sure fulfilment quickly get;
May you, released from Tony's power,
With wife and friends spend many an hour;
May health and wealth their blessings lend
To cheer the pathway of our friend.

While friends are gathering round you there,
Some hearts will bound with pleasure here
To feel that you at last are come
To work, to friends, to love, and home.
Yes, work! for we shal fondly look
For deeds beyond the prison book.
For vast returns your injuries call,
We're sure "our Bennett" will pay them all.

Though hatred fills near every heart
That watched our martyr's dreary fate
Toward the men that played their part
As engines of the church's hate,
'Tis on the creeds, not men, we feel
Our hero now must wield his steel.

We will not pray you'll seek revenge
On sneaking Tony's guilty head;
He'll get full many a conscience twinge
He'd fully miss if he were dead.
He soon must try another plan,
His course review, his actions scan;

And what can be the sure result
If they don't prove him steeped in guilt?
Here's the beauty of that doctrine
That after death doth punish sin!
When he has studied well his case
He'll dread "the Judge" when "face to face."

When evening shadows creep,
And misty dews shall fall,
When Luna through the azure sweeps,
And gilds the earth with silvery pall,
He'll dread the thoughts that clustering come
To make this hapless wight their home;

He'll dread the midnight's mystic hour,
And curse the hour that gave him birth;
He'll dread the fiendish demoniac power—
The veriest coward that walks the earth.
His faith, forsooth, in devils fell,
In fiery, seething realms of hell,

Shall prove the torture-rack and screw
To avenge the wrong he has done to you
And other victims of his power,
Cursed in his brief triumphant hour.
As evening toward the morning hies,
Each villainous deed its rancor flies
To scourge the hapless actor's mind,
Till peace and rest nowhere he'll find.

The de'il that to Ben Abou came
Shall then return, and Tony's "name"
Will quite a sorry figure cut,
Buried in mire and labeled "Smut."
Of "Cupid's Yokes" a table rare
We'll make, to inscribe this Satan's heir—
The lowest use to which the book
Could possibly be ever put.

Just think! in retrospection here
He'll nothing find but food for fear;
And know that in the time to come
He can but meet a "day of doom,"
He thinks the bad shall merit woe,
And never, never a heaven know.
He holds an awful hell was made
That deeds of evil should be paid

In coin the same as he'd like here,
To pass on victims of his power
(Only "forever" in that land
Is a longer term than courts command).
Is it not safe to leave the pup
For frenzied shame to eat him up?
Your pen is worthy of grander themes
Than this low villain's dastard schemes.

Forgive the length my lines hav run,
Forgive advice I've offered here!
Remember only you hav won
Respect from friends that hold you dear.

Remember that when life shall wane,
Your fame shall brighten every hour;
"Bennett" shall be a household name,
To hold for us a sacred power.

And when on memory's tablet done
The names of friends you trace,
Let that of Jennie Leete be one
To hold a favored place.

BERLIN, N. J., April 11, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I am very much pleased with the letter of Amelia H. Colby in relation to the reception of the bold martyr Bennett, and hope her suggestions will be carried out in a way that will result in the greatest good to Mr. Bennett and the Liberal cause, for which he has suffered so much. Let his friends in and around New York, who can attend the Reception at little or no expense, do so; and let those who cannot attend without spending from $2 to $5, or more, hold meetings in their own neighborhoods on Reception day or evening and enlighten their neighbors on the subject of his persecution and imprisonment, and then devote the money they will save to spreading THE TRUTH SEEKER and the account of his unjust trial. This would be a permanent benefit to him and the cause. It seems to me that any one who would only be a silent looker-on at the Reception could find more pleasure in sending THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to each of four friends in different places where the paper is not taken than in spending $3 for being a spectator at the Reception. The people need educating, as Amelia says. Every day I find intelligent business men who never heard of Mr. Bennett nor his paper. Let all spend their money conscientiously in a way that will result in the most permanent good to Mr. Bennett and the Liberal cause. Yours, J. HACKER.

ADDRESS AT THE RESURRECTION MEETING.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ: On your recent fortunate escape from the Prostestant Christian bastile in the United States of America, now controlled by the President of that republican government, in the year of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, 1880.

Persecution is the legitimate effect of the infernal doctrines of Christianity. "He that believeth shall be saved." "He that believeth not shall be damned." God is the author of hell and damnation. Man is his executor and executioner. Man has the same right to persecute and kill as God has to torture and damn mankind forever; therefore Christians always hav and always will persecute, and thus follow the example of their perfect, infallible God. If we expect Christians to be more merciful than their ideal Jehovah, we will be most certainly disappointed. We must judge of their future by their persecutions of the past. Like God, like worshipers. This rule will never change. How absolutely necessary, therefore, for Liberals to understand and fully realize this most important fact: Eternal vigilance is the only means of escape from Christian persecutions in all future coming time. Let every Liberal, loyal patriot remember this, and always act on the defensive. Let us now gird on our armor and faithfully and fearlessly battle for human rights and human happiness; with the full assurance that justice, mercy, and truth will eventually fill and cover the whole earth.

Hail! noble, brave chief, now in triumph ascended
From orthodox dungeons to liberty's throne.
The freedom we ask, you hav bravely defended,
And conquered our Christian oppressors—alone.
Not on the battle field,
Where the tried vet'rans yield,
You won the fresh laurels that circle your brow;
But on the plains of peace,
Bade persecution cease;
We approve, we applaud, we welcome you now.

Sir, upward and onward your pathway extending,
To stations of honor and fame you arise,
Like our bold eagle, still higher ascending,
To that elevation which Infidel's prize.
Sons of brave father's we,
Swear to be true and free,
False creeds and false Christians with truth we assail,
All our rights to maintain,
On the land and the main,
The star spangled banner shall float on the gale.

Grand Freethinkers rally; your duty demands it.
Be true to the last to our country and man,
Our faithful, experienced, bold hero commands it.
Our brave, loyal marshal again in the van.
To the bastile when led,
How our stricken hearts bled!
But truth is our trust when Christ's cannons do roar!
Still, the truth we'll defend,
From beginning to end,
"Fight it out on this line" till oppression is o'er.

We hav won many battles. Once, they would burn us,
Inquisitions and tortures our ancestors bore.
And if Protestants dare, they would torture and burn us,
But the holy old "hell Inquisition" is o'er.
Mercy, science, and truth,
Although yet in their youth,
A veto has put upon torture and pain.
Once, our country was free!
And again it will be,
Truth, justice, and mercy forever shall reign.

E. N. KINGSLEY.

ST. GEORGE, ILL., April 29, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find money order for three dollars to pay my subscription for one year to your valuable paper. This day, as I understand, ends your captivity, and the Albany prison door will be opened to restore you to that liberty which was unjustly and most injudiciously wrested from you. As a Liberal I feel proud of your manly conduct while serving out the unjust sentence so cruelly perpetrated upon you; and I also feel that the American nation should hang its head in shame for the perpetration of such lack of sense and justice on the part of its officials. It could only hav come by prejudice. It is contrary to all our feelings of humanity to wantonly cause pain. It is impossible to shape language so as to express a tithe of the real injury done to justice and the family of the editor of our much loved paper, to take him from his home and cast him into prison because he thinks for himself and asserts his rights and the rights of others. It is only worthy of the Young Men's Christian Association and the Society for the Suppression of Vice. It has always been the case that the more religion the more cruelty is practiced in its name.

All this evinces that we cannot hav or maintain a free government without eliminating the poisoning church dictation. This monstrosity, unsightly with human suffering, rotten with disreputable old age, is fast losing its hold on the hearts of intelligent people; it is time it should be so, for we can look only with dread upon the history of the church. We can see the best and purest men, who labored most to uplift humanity and advance the intelligence of the world, suffering all the cruelties of death that cruel rack and crisping flames could inflict. This is a light shadow of the ruling spirit in her past history.

I would ask what security hav we to-day and of what liberties can we as American citizens boast? For the truth we utter to-day for the ennobling and uplifting of mankind, to-morrow we may be thrown into prison with thieves and murderers to drag a miserable existence and expiate the wrath of Christian vengeance. Our lives may be disgraced and our children dishonored that Christianity may rule, perpetrate her fraud, and maintain her superstitions. We hav no protection, we hav no liberties, and never can hav while the iron hand of the church is upon the throat of the nation, strangling with a frantic hand every impulse of liberty. We hav but one hope, and that is all we can hope for to brighten the future—that reason and common sense may take the ascendancy and become the leading light in tracing the future steps of man, and then we can hope to hav a religion that will involve truth, justice, and freedom, the only trinity that will ever solve the salvation of mankind.

I am in deep sympathy with you, and I hope the Christian church will fulminate no more of its ruthless vengeance upon you and your rights. Yours truly, N. B. BLAINE.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.
JAMES PARTON.

Price, cloth, $1.50; paper, $1.00.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in th world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterances of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

"AN ESSAY ON THE BIBLE NARRATIVE OF CREATION."

By Augustus R. Grote, A.M.

The Boston Commonwealth says: It is a rationalistic examination of the scripture account, with a conclusion that the literal teaching of the theory is injurious to the mind, as it proves an impediment to intellectual advancement.

The Boston Traveler says: He has given a clear, yet condensed, criticism from the literary and scientific points of view. An eloquent and forcible protest against the tyranny of dogma. He endeavors to show that all efforts to reconcile science with a literal interpretation of the account of Genesis must only end in confusion.

The Popular Science Monthly says: The discrepancies between the two accounts are very fully indicated, and the different points of view from which they were written explained. . . . Interesting chapters follow on the myths of the old world, which resemble those of Genesis. . . . The book is characterized by directness of argument, and the best material has been diligently used. . . . The archæologist and philologist will find many new points in the book, which is noteworthy for its additions to science as well as for its distinctive literary merits. Paper 40 cents. For sale by

STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 25 cents.

This book contains an inspired PHOTOGRAPH of the GOD that's being worshiped at the expense of the district in our public schools: the God that "overshadowed" Mary; the God that's wanted in the Constitution; the gentleman that owns some three billion dollars' worth of untaxed church property; the "so-help-me" God that makes a lie the truth in court; the God that governors besought to stop the yellow fever, which he didn't do. ## ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health."

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE — nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are a liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR in person or by mail FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

A Few Words About the Devil,

And Other Biographical Sketches and Essays.

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second edition, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1 25.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him. —The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.

The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

Martyrdom of Man,

A Compendium of Universal History

BY WINWOOD READE.

SECOND EDITION.

Large clear type, toned paper, broad margins, extra cloth, 12mo, 543 pp., $1.75.

Mr. Reade's historical survey of the world of nature and man, marvelous as it is, in its multitude of details, in its comprehensive sweep, in its terse, splendid paragraphs, in its evidence of wide and careful reading, and its general accuracy, gives the impression of a reading as immense as that of Hume, Gibbon, or of Buckle.

EXTRACT.—The good in this world predominates over the bad; the good is ever increasing, the bad is ever diminishing. But, if God is ove, why is there any bad at all? Is the world like a novel, in which the villains are put in to make it more dramatic, and in which virtue only triumphs in the third volume? It is certain that the feelings of the created hav in no way been considered. If, indeed, there were a judgment-day, it would be for man to appear at the bar, not as a criminal, but as an accuser. What has he done that he should be subjected to a life of torture and temptation? God might hav made us all happy, and he has made us miserable. Is that benevolence? God might hav made us all pure, and he has made us all sinful. Is that the perfection of morality? If I believed in this man-created God, in this divine Nebuchadnezzar, I would say, You can make me liv in your world, O Creator, but you cannot make me admire it; you can load me with chains, but you cannot make me flatter you; you can send me to hell-fire, but you cannot obtain my esteem. And if you condemn me, you condemn yourself. If I hav committed sins, you invented them, which is worse. If the watch you hav made does not go well, whose fault is that? Is it rational to damn the wheels and the springs?

A New and Important Work, entitled

OUTLINES OF PHRENOLOGY.

BY F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.,

Graduate of the Hygeio-Therapeutic College and the New York Phrenological Institute.

This work is intended both as a chart for the use of phrenologists and a text-book for students of phrenology. As a chart it will be found fuller and more complete than any other work of its size on this subject. It contains in addition to the "Table of Developments," one of "Adaptation to Different Pursuits," and one of "Conjugal Adaptation." These tables being perfectly easy to understand, are calculated to render the work at once both interesting and useful. The work contains also full and clear descriptions of the temperaments, the nutritive functions, health, etc., and all the faculties and powers of the mind in seven different degrees of development, along with excellent rules for health and self-improvement. Its explanation of the principles of phrenology, etc., and its other important remarks will be found well adapted to the needs of students and others who may desire to acquire an elementary knowledge of phrenology with as little outlay of time and labor as possible. In short, this work will be found well adapted to the needs of both students and phrenological examiners.

The work contains 105 pages, with an excellent map of the head, showing the locations of all the faculties, and is handsomely printed and bound. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Notes and Clippings.

THERE are said to be at this moment more editors in than out of prison in Russia.

AN apple threw the first man. Since then it has sorter let the business out to the banana.

THE railway to the top of Vesuvius is now completed, and its formal inauguration will take place this month.

THE task of transforming Rome into a modern city has proved a very costly affair, and the undertaking is now at a halt from lack of further funds.

THE trustees of the Rev. J. H. Hartley's church in Cincinnati hav asked him to resign on account of his habit of borrowing money and never paying.

THE Rev. Mr. Perrin, of Springfield, proclaims from his pulpit that checkers, chess, backgammon, and croquet are sinful under any circumstances.

AN Iowa clergyman has resigned from the ministry on account of his eyes. He can see well enough with them, but they are so grotesquely crossed that he thinks they destroy his usefulness in the pulpit.

A BOLD, bad man in Kokomo recently broke up a church sociable, at which conundrums were being given, by asking why women were like flowers, and then, after everybody had given it up, replying that they shut up when they sleep.

THE Baptists of San Francisco hav turned their backs on Brother Kalloch, and are anxious to push him out from their fraternity. The present complication of political and ecclesiastical mishaps shows this brother in a very unlovely light.

THE inmates of the monastery on Mount Ararat had so little to do that old Satan found work for their idle hands. The prior and several of his subordinates hav been arrested on a charge of making bogus Russian money, both silver and paper.

OF all the nations living under the scepter of the Czar the Jews are the best educated. The proportion of the Jews in Russia is one Jew to every twenty Russians; while in the colleges the proportion of students is one Jewish scholar to every six Russians.

THE increasing number of spelling reformers in Europe and America has created a desire among the members of the various associations for some means of strengthening the bond of union. There is some talk of an International Congress of Spelling Reformers, to be held in London or on the continent in the autumn.

AT Flatbush, a boy who had charge of a very stubborn donkey was one day beating it unmercifully because it would not go, when the minister of the parish, coming up, censured him for his cruelty. The boy resented the interference, and exclaimed: "I'm sure you needn't care; it's none o' your congregation."

MOST of the shops in Athens hav been kept open on Sunday. Recently a priest of the Greek church has greatly exercised himself to put this practice down. His sermons against it were attentively listened to by the shopkeepers, who hav now agreed to keep their establishments closed on the Day of Rest. That Greek priest would hav his hands full in New York.

LITTLE Georgie was taken to church last Sunday for the first time. Of course he was plied with questions when he got home—what did he think of this, that, and the other? What did he see and what did he hear? "What did the minister say, George?" asked his mother. "He said, 'Dreat Dod!' dust way papa did todder day when he was putting down tarpet and hit his finger wiv um hammer."

FOR the sake of peace, the so-called Ritualistic church of St. Clement, in Philadelphia, has consented to "put in abeyance" such of its ceremonies as hav awakened the ire of the Standing Committee of the diocese and the official censure of the bishop. At the same time both the rector and the vestry tell al concerned, in pretty plain language, that they consider this interference in their affairs unwarranted and impertinent, not to say unchristin.

WHEN Col. Ingersoll lectured in Boston the Boston theater wasn't big enough to contain his audience. Otis Mills followed Ingersoll with a review of his lecture, treating the subject "by the light of Christianity and spirit of truth." Extraordinary efforts were made to secure an audience, and it is said that just forty-three were in attendance. We speak of this to show on which side the people stand and not at all as evidence that Ingersoll is right or the other man wrong.—Winsted Press.

COURTLANDT PALMER wrote in response to an invitation to attend the D. M. Bennett Reception in New York: "The very reason why the bigots put him (Bennett) in the penitentiary is the very reason why I support him, viz., because I differ radically in my opinions from him, from his paper, and from 'Cupid's Yokes,' for mailing which he was convicted." There is nobility and broad liberality in that sentiment which everybody should cultivate. The first thought of the bigot is to suppress, and if he has the power he uses it. The first thought of the honest, broad-souled man is that when truth and error are given equal opportunities truth will inevitably triumph.—Winsted Press.

THE venerable Henry White, when Professor of Theology at Union Seminary, was much annoyed by a young upstart who preferred circumlocution to plain English, and who had a misty way of expressing himself. He asked this student in what the happiness of heaven consisted. The young man pompously replied, "In a proper balance of the intellect and sensibilities." The professor then asked with a pleasantly sarcastic smile, "Suppose you had been on a visit to the sea-shore, and should say on your return that you had enjoyed there 'a proper balance of the intellect and sensibilities'—would that mean an oyster or a clam?" The self-confident young person became so befogged that he was speechless, amid the mirth of his fellow-students.

QUESTIONS IN ASTRONOMY.—I see that George R. Cather says, in the Sun of April 16: "If the earth were struck out of existence, the moon would still go on around the sun as unconcernedly as though Mr. Davis and Prof. Proctor had not raised the question about its motion; and if the sun were suddenly annihilated, the moon would still go on around the earth as if nothing had happened." Mr. Cather does not bring proof to back his bold assumption. If he should attempt to do so he might not succeed any better than "Urana" did when he attempted to support Prof. Proctor in saying that the "moon does not revolve around the earth." Allow me to ask Mr. Cather a question: Does the moon go any further through space than the earth does in their journey around the sun? The question is asked for information.—Silas Davis in Sun.

THE Rev. William J. Bridells was pastor of a Presbyterian church at Marietta, Pa., for eight years, and during all of that time he made periodical visits to Philadelphia, where, with boon companions, he indulged in the pleasures of drunkenness. These indulgences were finally suspected by members of his church, and he resigned; but there were no formal proceedings against him, and he immediately became pastor of the Lehigh avenue Presbyterian church, Philadelphia. His wife kept his secret until her jealousy was aroused by his obvious love for a pretty widow. Then she not only exposed him to the church officials, but took every bit of furniture out of the house—all being her property—leaving him lying on a bare floor. His Presbytery has expelled him, and he has been sued for the board of the widow, with whom he has lived since his disgrace.

SOME of the outspoken who attended the Methodist General Conference at Cincinnati criticise the brethren for their lack of devotional habits. It is said that during the hour when the Conference engages in prayer and praise there are from eighty to one hundred and fifty of its members in the lobby, chatting on miscellaneous matters, and it is further said that just before the election of bishops most of these brethren were lobbying and pulling wires for their favorite candidates. This being done, they could cheerfully go inside and join in asking the Lord to direct the casting of the vote so that it might result in the selection of men who would be acceptable and well-pleasing in his sight. Many of the brethren are unhappy over the way the election has resulted, especially as the four new bishops are all from this immediate neighborhood, instead of being taken from the Central and Western states. It is thought that there may yet be another election for three or four bishops. The colored people are clamorous for a bishop of their own complexion and the Germans want one of their own nationality.

DEEP-SEA animals as a rule have either no eyes at all or have very large eyes. As an example may be cited the crustacean, Astacus galencus, most closely allied to the common cray-fish which Professor Huxley has lately made illustrious. It is from 450 fathoms. It has no eyes at all, but one of its nippers is extraordinarily long and delicate, and possibly the animal uses it to feel its way with, as a blind man uses his stick. There are also abundant hairs on the animal's surface, which are probably organs of touch. Many deep-sea crustacea, however, have very large eyes, indeed, evidently for the purpose of making use of some small quantity of light which must exist in all depths. In the absence of sunlight the only other source of light must be phosporescence of certain of the deep-sea animals themselves. No doubt many animals, as in shallow water, emit light in the deep sea; and the deep-sea animals with eyes probably congregate round them or grope their way in the gloom from one bunch to another as they lie scattered over the bottom, just as we half feel, half see our way from lamp-post to lamp-post in a night fog. Some lose their way, as we do sometimes, and get into shallow water, and a good many deep-sea animals have been from time to time picked up near the shores at Maderia and elsewhere, and have found their way into museums as great rarities. No doubt the sense of touch is the one mainly relied on by most deep-sea animals. Very many are provided with special organs of touch, such as long hairs, or in the case of fish, enormously long fin-rays.

SOME days ago Mr. Ballou, of Rhode Island, introduced in the House a bill in the interest of so-called "spelling reform," providing for the appointment of a commission of seven persons, "who shall examine the orthography used in the public documents and in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and inquire how much its defects increase the cost of the public printing, and how far they are an impediment to the acquisition and use of the English language and to education, and inquire what amendments in orthography, if any, may be easily introduced into the public documents and the schools of the District of Columbia, and accepted in examinations for the civil service, and whether it is expedient to move the government of Great Britain to unite in constituting a joint commission to consider such amendments." The bill was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, which has submitted a favorable report upon it. The bill is now on the calendar. The report, written by Mr. Ballou, declares that it is deemed worthy of serious consideration and careful inquiry whether the language, which perhaps is destined to become universal, may not be simplified and abbreviated in its orthography by omitting the silent and unnecessary letters and using only those which most naturally and simply convey the sound of the words when pronounced. The committee says it has been informed by leading educators that the irregular spelling of the English language causes a loss of two years of each child's school time, is a main cause "of the alarming illiteracy of our people," involves an annual expense of many millions of dollars for teachers and for writing and printing superfluous letters, and is in many other ways an obstacle to the progress of education. The committee has also been told by experienced teachers and learned scholars that a great reform can be made in English spelling, and that a system can be devised, "to be gradually and wisely introduced, which will be a great improvement in facilitating education, and a great saving of expense to the government and the people, in the printing of public documents, schoolbooks, and periodicals." The committee, therefore, recommends the appointment of a commission, "as a preliminary step and for the purpose of having some well-defined plan and system presented to the public before any definite and radical change is made."

Events of the Week.

THE first colored lawyer in this city was admitted to practice a few days ago.

A BROOKLN preacher was sued last week for a pretty long and large liquor and cigar bill.

A CYCLONE struck Rosebud Landing, Dakota, on the 15th instant, destroying many buildings.

THE Pope has recently undergone several painful surgical operations, and is pretty low.

AN explosion in an iron-foundry at Walsall, England, on the 15th, killed twenty-five persons and injured sixty.

THE Russian government is adopting a more liberal and humane policy, and is liberating many of its political prisoners.

THE monks in a monastery on Mount Ararat hav been extensively engaged in counterfeiting. They now serve God in prison.

SIXTEEN men were buried by the caving of a mine near Norway, Mich., on the 13th. Thirteen were rescued alive, but severely injured.

THREE boatloads of survivors from the steamer American, which sunk at sea, hav been rescued. Two other boatloads are missing.

TEN thousand herring were caught at one haul, one day last week, at Mantua Creek, N. J. This beats the New Testament fish story.

THE fires among the oil wells near Bradford, Pa., are spreading and destroying an immense amount of property. Fires are epidemic.

A DESTRUCTIVE hailstorm passed over Virginia on the 15th. Meanwhile we are having a touch of midsummer heat here in this city.

CHIEF Judge Sanford E. Church, of the Court of Appeals, died at his home at Albion, N. Y., on the 14th. He was universally respected.

SEVERAL piers and thirty or forty houses were destroyed by fire at Stuyvesant, N. Y., on the 15th. The loss will amount to about $200,000.

THREE parties of prospectors on the Gunnison River, Col., fifty-five persons in all, are reported massacred by the Utes, who are on the warpath.

A MAN in Cayuga county, N. Y., in digging a well, struck a vein of water which throws a three-inch stream fifty feet into the air. It is still spouting vigorously.

THOUSANDS of acres of woodland in New Jersey and on Long Island are being burnt over, and houses, barns, and fences are destroyed by the flames. The farmers are fighting the fire.

A CARGO of munitions of war for the Cuban revolutionists, including torpedoes and nitro-glycerine, was successfully landed in Cuba recently, and the patriots are preparing for one more struggle for liberty.

Two more clergymen hav come to grief on account of their immoral practices, or rather through being found out. One is the Rev. Mr. Peltz, of Jamestown, N. Y.; the other is the Rev. Mr. Bridells, of Philadelphia.

FOUR men were killed many others injured, a mill demolished, and Rome, N. Y., shaken by the explosion of a boiler in that city on the 10th. The boiler, twenty-two feet long and five feet in diameter, shot fifty feet into the air and landed four hundred feet from the mill.

A WOMAN in Chatham, N. C., supposed to be dead, was buried. A couple of nights afterward two men opened the grave to steal some jewelry that had been left on the woman. They found her alive, helped her from the grave, and took her to her home, where she is now enjoying excellent health.

THE Rev. Mr. Franklin, of the church of the Evangelists, in Philadelphia, was asked by the warden of the church, at a recent church meeting, to explain some little discrepancies or crookednesses in his account with the church. The clergyman replied by giving the warden a good thrashing, and the crookedness is crookeder than ever.

SIX hundred and sixty-six houses were burnt at Milton, Pa., on the 14th. Only two business houses were left standing. One person was burnt and another frightened to death. The people of the town are almost destitute. Seven churches were destroyed, valued at $75,000. Food, clothing, and tents were at once sent to the sufferers. The loss will reach $1,600,000.

"Does Death End All?"—Part Second.

BY E. A. CHAPMAN.

People say they never had an opportunity to investigate Spiritualism. First, inquire carefully who are reliable mediums, visit them in a spirit of honesty and candor, take the Golden Rule along, let every fact be accepted as a fact, get rid of all prejudice, and let reason be the supreme judge. See to it that the jury to whom reason givs her charge shall never bring in a false verdict. Take THE TRUTH SEEKER, Banner of Light, Mind and Matter, Voice of Angels, Rational Appeal, or some other Spiritual paper, and read it, but not as the Christian reads the Bible. Be slow to accept and slower to condemn. "Prove all things," and "hold fast the good." Sit right down at home with wife, children, or neighbors who are congenial and likewise interested, and be assured the spirit world will find some way to manifest their presence and giv proof of their identity. Persevere, and as soon as possible they will giv words of wisdom and teach the better way. Remember, in the world, we must hav conditions for everything. If we are to print a newspaper we must hav a press, etc.; if to send a telegram, we must use the telegraph wires; if to dig in the ground, we must hav a spade, hoe, or plow, and just so it is with the spirits. Don't ask or expect them to work without conditions or tools. Remember, their bodies are in the graves; that they are not of flesh and blood, and if they are to manifest to our material senses they must use material agencies to do it. As they hav not organisms like ours, adapted to this work, do not be surprised if a loan is asked, for a short time, of the organisms you occupy. Be passive and willing. Ask no foolish questions, and talk only when strongly impressed to do so. Treat the spirits as you would treat people here, precisely. There is no difference. Here you cannot see the spirits within yourselves; all that is seen is the "house of flesh." We are spirits just the same and just as much as we ever shall be, therefore, spirits are men and women, human beings, and should hav decent treatment and a respectful hearing. Be assured the spirits rejoice and are exceeding glad when we make conditions so they can come and teach us the true philosophy of life. Four years ago a friend of mine lost a beautiful daughter of eight summers. He and his wife were both in fellowship with the church. On receipt of the news I wrote them, offering the consolations of Spiritualism.

I said, If you will make the necessary conditions as I shall direct, I feel sure you will hear from your child, and others. They did as directed, and in three months his arm was controlled to write, and he was receiving loving messages from his daughter and others. He then wrote: "I will never again sneer at Spiritualism. With us it is a demonstrated fact, and I would not exchange the consolation, peace, and knowledge it affords, for all the wealth of the world. My grief has passed away. I know our beloved Agnes livs, and is with us." In six months his spiritual vision and hearing were opened. He could see spirits, and hear their messages. Within one year he wrote again: "My organism is controlled by some other intelligence than my own, and made to talk, in words of wisdom and eloquence, as I cannot. I seem to be listening, the same as others addressed." He and his wife are to-day earnest workers in behalf of Spiritualism. "Whereas the things they once loved they now hate, and the things they once hated they now love." Many times the question is asked, "What good is Spiritualism?" The following from my own experience will in part answer the question.

A few years ago a lady in spirit-life, whom we hav every reason to love and respect as a friend and guide, controlled my wife, who is an excellent medium, and asked of me the following request. She said, "Mr. C., I, as a spirit-friend, guide, and visitor here, hav a favor to ask of you, and as it is reasonable I feel sure you will grant it." I replied, "Certainly I will." She then said: "Death has not destroyed our sense of modesty. Obscenity or profanity is just as offensive to us as it used to be, therefore, will you not refrain at all times from the use of the same? We, as your guides, want the assurance that we can come to you without having our modesty shocked by ungentlemanly language or conduct. Our existence to us is as real as yours is to you; therefore please treat us as you would if we were still in the form and in your presence. Remember that pure spirits will be driven from your presence by bad language or conduct." The request was indeed most reasonable, as well as sensible, and I blushed with shame that I had not thought of it before.

Here was a revelation that to me was of the utmost importance. Instead of living as if the eye of God were upon us, we should liv, realizing that the eyes of our parents, brothers, sisters, and other dear friends in spirit-life, are upon us. We should remember that impure thoughts, words, and actions poison the very atmosphere about us, so that only impure spirits can approach us. I do not wonder that those who do not lead pure lives declare that only evil spirits are able to return, or that it is all "the work of the devil." When our own spirits are pure there is no danger of being troubled by evil spirits or devils. As a polecat would compel us to leave its presence, so do wicked or filthy people compel pure spirits to leave theirs. The trouble is in us, and not Spiritualism. There are two scales or roads—the ascending and descending, as there are two laws by which to grade every thought or action—the wrong and the right. If Spiritualism is not a blessing, it is a curse, and we can take our choice.

Before I became a Spiritualist, death was the great nightmare of my life; it filled the whole earth with a dark, impenetrable gloom of doubt and despair. Now I look forward to that crisis as the most joyous event of my existence. Every feeling of doubt and dread is gone forever. I eagerly long for the time to come, for it will be but an open door through which I shall pass to a more beautiful world beyond. This, to me, is not faith or "guess work," it is knowledge. I am as certain that I hav communicated with the "so-called dead" as I am that I liv. If this is not true, then very much of what the world accepts as knowledge must be called by another name.

The following are some of the facts which I hav accepted as proofs of a future existence: Five years ago I knew nothing of Spiritualism. Until then I had ridiculed and denounced it most bitterly. My first move was to visit a medium, an utter stranger. Without the slightest hint as to who I was, she described and gave the names of dear friends in spirit-life, also many facts which only those friends and myself knew. To me it was extremely significant that a matter long forgotten should be recalled, together with the name of the individual most intimately associated with the same. Subsequently my wife visited the same medium, and, without an introduction, received an accurate description of many friends in spirit-life, together with names and messages. The first described was her father, who had been a Baptist clergyman. His name and occupation were given. His message was: "Tell my daughter I spent my life inculcating false doctrines; and now, before I can progress, I must return and undo that work; I must substitute, as far as possible, the truth where I taught errors. This is the true way." A brother was next described, but my wife said, "No, I never lost a brother." His message was: "Tell my sister I never breathed the air of this world. I hav grown up in spirit-life." My wife then remembered hearing her mother tell her when a little girl that her oldest child was a boy and was "born dead." This could not hav been "mind-reading." Next was described the little ones whom we had buried, with names of the same. Their message was: "You won't let us in, mamma; you keep the doors closed against us. Please open the door and let us in. We love you, mamma. We are your little darlings, if we are spirits. Don't be afraid of spirits, mamma; they love us and you."

You who are striving to crush Spiritualism, do you realize what you are doing? Other facts were given equally as startling as the above. Previous to this Mrs. C. had experienced many times a nervous, chilly sensation, not unlike an ague-chill, and took quinine to correct it. This the medium laughingly referred to, and asked if quinine was recommended as a cure for Spiritualism, stating that it was the spirits that caused those peculiar sensations; that she was being developed as a medium. We mutually agreed that we had found something worthy of investigation. We then organized a circle for investigation in our own home, and hav indeed been richly rewarded. We hav received by our own fireside, through our own organisms, not only knowledge of a future existence, but spiritual, intellectual, and moral development that is indeed wonderful. No power on earth could compel us to return to the darkness which preceded the rising, for us, of the glorious sun of modern Spiritualism, My wife was quickly developed as a medium, and the tests we hav received through her organism would convince the world could they be received from our standpoint. She sees and hears the spirits, having described for utter strangers hundreds of their friends, giving their names, with other proofs and tests of identity.

The first spirit that succeeded in fully controlling her organism was an Italian lady, who talked through her the pure Italian dialect. The next was "Arrowano, the medicine-man of the Winnebagoes." Then came those more advanced in spirit-life. I speak of this because I shall giv a few of the hundreds of tests and proofs of a future life I hav received through her. But first let me answer the oft-asked question, Why do Indians come so much? They desire the knowledge and culture which the whites possess, and, by associating with mediums, they are enabled to gain the experience and knowledge they covet. Again, they are natural magnetic healers, and are more than willing to giv in exchange for the good they receive their magnetism and strength. I love my Indian friends, and do all I can to please and help them. I often see bright-colored stars, and know by their tint who is present. I feel the magnetic touch of their hands, and can tell when they are pleased and when not. Many times I am asked to explain this or that, and always do so to the best of my ability. I never refuse a reasonable request. I know the spirits hav done for me that which would not hav been done had I not been interested, appreciative, and true. As I write, their thoughts are impressed on my mind, and these thoughts are more theirs than my own. I am in earnest in this matter. I find myself in harmony with that upward scale of an endless progression, and, while yet incased in this material shell, shall improve my time to the best of my ability. The spirit-world realize this, and heartily respond to all my efforts. "God helps those who help themselves," is a good old saying, but none the less true because God and the Holy Ghost hav been compelled to giv way to the more reasonable idea of a spirit-world.

One day, about three years ago, while going to my business, I saw and listened to some Italian musicians of musical merit. Feeling the presence of the Italian lady, "Bianca," I requested her to make of it a test when I should return at night. At tea Mrs. C. said: "What does it mean? I see some musicians playing on hand-organs and tambourines." I then explained about the musicians and my request. Perhaps it was mind-reading, but we do not think so. To us, mind-reading is an exceedingly weak hypothesis, incapable of proof, and much more absurd than the Spiritual theory. In one sense it is mind-reading, but the spirits read our minds, and manifest, by their mesmeric power, through our sensitive organisms.

One morning Mrs. C. was controlled by an Indian, who, in broken English, said: "I am your guide and friend, Dassa-notah, the Potawatamie. I knew you when you were a papoose. Your mother was a good old squaw. She was kind to us Indians. She fed us when we were hungry. One day she baked potatoes in the hot ashes and gave us to eat. Write her; she will remember." I then wrote to my mother, who, with my eldest sister, remembered the precise circumstances. I was born in Kalamazoo county, Michigan, where those Indians were at that time, and Mrs. C. did not know it, at least neither she nor I knew of the potatoes being baked and given to the Indians. Was it mind-reading?

While at work one day I was seized with a severe pain in one of my lungs. In a short time both lungs were as if a knife were cutting through them. I could breathe only with the greatest difficulty. Knowing that Mrs. C. possessed strong healing power under control of her Indian guide, Arrowano, I at once started for home, sending word that I was coming. When I arrived I found my wife seated in a chair, under control of said guide, and "heavily charged," but for what purpose she knew not. Without a word being said, she at once was made to pound my lungs with both hands, one back, the other front, and in five minutes I was relieved of what I believed to be a severe attack of congestion. Was it mind-reading?

Just below this village, in Flat River, is an island. One day, about a year ago, my little boy, about seven years of age, had permission to cross on the logs, which had floated down from the pine woods, and which then lay upon the bottom. In about half an hour my spirit friends gave me a severe shock, accompanied with a feeling of alarm. I at once asked if my boy was in the river. The answer was, "Yes." By a certain code of signals I can converse with them at any moment. I at once hurried to the island. He had been to the fort of the island, fallen in, and barely escaped drowning. He had been entirely submerged, and was nearly dragged under by the current. Hundreds of times I hav worried about him, as parents will who liv near water, and my friends hav always assured me, except on this occasion, that he was safe. To me this was a most remarkable test.

My business is photographing. About three years ago I was seriously annoyed by a peculiar fogging of my plates whenever the atmosphere was warm and moist and the wind in a certain direction. The nature of the fog was such that I knew the cause, but could not find it. I hunted in vain three months, and then referred the matter to my spirit friends. I knew some of my guides had formerly been photographers, and were attracted to me because they still loved the business, and hoped, in some way, to benefit mankind by furnishing the proofs through photography of a future life. I was almost in despair, for my work told most plainly that something was wrong. Through Mrs. C. they directed me to "look in the wall of my dark room." I knew it was not there; but as I had asked their advice, I could not do less than look. I did so, and found a hole four inches square, through which, formerly, a water conductor had passed. Reaching my hand down between the two walls, I found a half bushel of paper and rags, which another artist had placed there the winter before to exclude the air. The rags, etc., were moist and rapidly decaying. From these a gas was generated, which came into my dark room and caused the trouble. After they were removed the trouble disappeared. If that was mind-reading, I should be pleased to know whose mind was read.

Through Mrs. C. those photographers gave me a recipe for a most excellent toning-bath, containing chemicals which, so far as I know, no other artist uses, also a corrective for a foul silver-bath, and other directions which are invaluable. Mrs. C. knows nothing whatever of the chemicals used in photographing. I never refer matters to my spirit friends till I hav exhausted my own resources. I seldom consult them on business matters. I think that is not the object of Spiritualism. They tell us to rely on ourselves, and then when we hav overcome an obstacle we shall maintain our individuality and earn the strength and reward we receive. The object of Spiritualism is to help us develop a true manhood and womanhood; to teach us how to liv, that when we reach the other shore we shall not regard the life here as a failure, and to giv us the proof of immortality.

A year ago Mr. William Weir, the celebrated inventor and well-digger, and wife, whom we had never met before, were present with us at a circle. Mrs. C. described a spirit-child leaning on the lap of Mrs. Weir, and said she heard the name Jessie. Why, said Mrs. W., that is our child. Mrs. C. then said she heard the name Jim Forsyth, but they could remember no one by that name. She then saw and described a coarse, brutal-looking fellow, with mall, wedges, and a long, sharp, murderous-looking knife, and gave his message, which was: "Mr. Weir, many years ago you and I split rails together." "Why," said Mr. Weir, "that's Jim Forsyth, who worked for father in Canada when I was a boy. I gave him an awful whipping one day for abusing a cripple, and I shall always think he tried to murder me one night through revenge." Mrs. C. was then controlled by the spirit lady referred to in one of the above tests, and said: "This man cannot be permitted to control the sensitive organism of this medium. So coarse and uncultured an operator would injure so delicate an instrument, so I will giv his message for him. He tried to murder you, Mr. Weir, as you supposed, and has had to suffer during all these years the same punishment he would had he succeeded in taking your life. He has followed you during all these years from place to place hoping almost vainly that some opportunity might be offered whereby he could make confession and ask your forgiveness, that he might be relieved from this terrible load of guilt and be permitted to pass from darkness into light. He cannot progress till you forgive him. We think you can afford to do so." Mr. Weir said, "I freely forgive him."

If, as I firmly believe, the above are facts, that redeemed spirit is dwelling in a brighter sphere, made happy by and through the glorious revelation of Spiritualism to humanity.

The above are a few of the hundreds of tests we hav received, and are still daily receiving, from the loved ones who dwell in the summer land. We cannot afford to heed the sneers of the ignorant and bigoted. We pity them, and desire so much that they, too, could know the truth; that they, too, would listen to the knocking of their spirit friends; that they would open their spiritual doors and bid the silent messengers of love, peace, harmony, and immortality enter and dwell with them forevermore.

"Life is real; life is earnest,
And the grave is not its goal.
'Dust thou art, to dust returnest,'
Was not spoken of the soul."

Mr. Downey's Pictures for the National Capitol.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Mr. Downey, the delegate from Wyoming territory, has offered a bill in Congress appropriating half a million of dollars for paintings, by American artists, to be hung up on the walls of the National Capitol, in which paintings shall be represented the events in the history of Jesus Christ, as they are narrated in the gospels and in the Apostles' Creed. Some time ago when the crucifixion, in a Passion Play, was performed at San Francisco, the municipal authorities, at the instance of the Protestant ministers, forbade its being repeated because it was a travesty on the atonement, which is the leading doctrine of the church, and the grand expedient by which guilty sinners can, not only be pardoned, but justified. Now, however, it is proposed that the United States in Congress assembled shall appropriate the people's money to hav representations on canvas not only of the crucifixion, but of all the various points in the history of Christ, as that history is given by the four evangelists, from the miraculous conception at Nazareth to the ascension into heaven in the suburbs of Jerusalem. All this is designed to confirm the assertion in the preamble to the bill that "the people of the United States as a Christian people." It is against my principles as a Radical and Secularist to hav the public money used for anything else than political purposes, but I will pay out of my own pocket $500 toward the sum requisite to carry out Mr. Downey's idea, believing that it would do more to help the cause of Secularism than anything else the Radicals could devise. According to Mr. Downey's programme there are six parts, or items, as given in the gospels, and the Apostles' Creed. Let us look at them briefly and in detail.

1. The miraculous conception of Jesus. Luke, the evangelist, in his first chapter, informs us of an interview between the angel Gabriel and Mary on this subject, during which the angel assured her that "the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore, also that holy thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God." Matthew says that "the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When, as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost."

Now, if we inquire of the creeds of Christendom as to who this Holy Ghost was, for the parties were all Jews, and there was no Holy Ghost in the theology of the Jews, the answer is that he was the joint offspring of God the Father, and God the Son, the first two persons in the trinity. Hence the phraseology in all the creeds—"proceeding from the Father and the Son." If then the Holy Ghost begat Jesus on the person of the Jewish maid known as the Virgin Mary, it is a clear case of a child begetting his own father. How do you suppose, Mr Editor, a painter would go about describing on canvas—for that is required in Mr. Downey's bill—the miraculous begetting of Jesus? It would be easy to paint the young woman, but how would he represent the personage called by Gabriel "The Highest"—meaning thereby the eternal God, creator of the heavens and the earth? "No man hath seen God at any time." How then could Mr. Downey's American artist giv a representation of a being no man ever saw, and of whom no idea could be formed? Moreover, this indescribable Holy Ghost is said to hav overshadowed the Virgin, according to the angel's promise. This phrase suggests the idea commonly entertained by the devout, but without any scriptural authority, that "The Higbest"—the Holy Ghost—assumed the form of a dove with wings such as he took at the baptism of Jesus in the river Jordon. There seems to be some mental incongruity here, but if Mr. Downey insists that the Holy Ghost shall hav wings and be a dove, when he generated his own father on the person of the Virgin, I am agreed to it, and we will allow the artist to paint it accordingly. On a little reflection I will double my subscription to the fund for the artist who will giv the people of the United States an intelligible idea of this first step in the history of Jesus Christ. The picture when completed, as it is the first in the programme, and is to describe the most curious event in history, should be put in the most conspicuous panel in the rotunda of the Capitol; and I hav no doubt it would be studied, if not admired, by every visitor, and would immortalize the name of the man in whose fertile mind it was a conception.

2. The second item, after the immaculate conception by the Holy Ghost, is his birth in the manger at Bethlehem. Mr. Downey's artist could get much help in this particular from our Catholic brethren, in the pictures which line the walls of their cathedrals and churches; but for pity's sake don't let him make the same mistake the old Dutch painters did who represented the stable where Christ was born as being surrounded by houses precisely such as you now see in the city of Amsterdam; and the virgin mother as a stout, square-built, flaxen-haired, good-natured, young woman, just like the Holland damsels of the present day. This would be almost as incongruous as those pictures of Christ blessing little children in Judea in which the little girls are all very white and curly-headed Anglo-Saxons, and dressed in laced shoes, with a dress coming only to the knees; or, such as one might hav seen in Berks county, Pa., forty years ago, where, in "The sacrifice of Isaac," the Patriarch is represented as a heavy-set Prussian dragoon in short jacket, shooting his son with a horse pistol. Let us hav the birth just as it was.

3. The suffering under Pontius Pilate, the crucifixion, death, and burial of Jesus, all being natural events could be more easily described, and so I shall start no inquiries on these points.

4. The descent into hell, which is affirmed in the Apostles' Creed, but which is nowhere asserted in the gospels, nor in any other cotemporaneous authority, seems a very difficult event to represent in a painting. With all the aid of the old Greek mythology, especially Pluto's theft of Proserpine and his descent into hell with her behind a pair of horses black as ebony, and with the hints in Dante's "Inferno," how could an artist, even if he were an American, describe a dead person's descent into hell, when, as in this case, the person was Jesus who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners? This descent into hell is nowhere taught in the New Testament. It was the creation of theology. The atonement was made to redeem, buy off, and pay the debt of the sinner due to the justice of God, which debt was suffering the agony of eternal hell-fire.

Christ, therefore, must descend into hell for that purpose. But a part of three days was not equal to eternity, and therefore his divinity must giv a value to his sufferings which they would not otherwise hav. One of the great painters has described the descent from the cross, but who could describe the descent into hell?

5. We now come to Mr. Downey's fifth scene in the history of Christ—his resurrection from the dead. To put in parallel columns the four accounts of this event given by the four evangelists the student of the subject will see from the inconsistent and conflicting reports how difficult it would be to paint the scene as it was. Mr. Downey's bill provides, and very properly too, that all the events in Christ's history shall be painted as they are told in the four gospels. It is most certain that I shall be a member of Congress, if not President of the United, when the paintings are finished and presented for inspection; and I assure Mr. Downey, and the painters too, that I shall officially oppose the acceptance of the same unless they are painted according to the facts on record. If we pay for a picture of a lion we don't want to be shabbed off with a centaur, or a Pan. The article must be according to order. In this case the witnesses, or rather the historians, are all equally inspired, and one cannot be followed at the expense of the others. "Paint me as I am," said Cromwell, when the artist proposed to omit the wart on his face. Without the wart he would not be Cromwell. But I would respectfully suggest that the four accounts be represented in four pictures so that the spectater can hav before his eyes proof of the plenary inspiration of the New Testament.

6. The sixth and last event in the life of Jesus which Mr. Downey wishes to be represented on canvas is the ascension into heaven. Luke and the writers of the Acts of the Apostles both say that he mounted upon a cloud, and went up out of sight into heaven. This was written when the theory of the earth as a part of the solar system was, that the earth was the fixed center, that the sun and stars moved round it, and that hell was beneath like the cellar of a house, while heaven was in the upper, or third story. But the modern astronomy proves all these ideas to be false, and that the earth has a constant motion on its axis in space, and another in its yearly circuit round the sun. When, therefore, a schoolboy looks upon Mr. Downey's picture of a man weighing 120 pounds at least, stepping on a cloud of vapor, and being borne up into heaven from a revolving globe, would it not bring his risible faculties into play rather than inspire him with devotional feeling?

Mr. Editor, if the claims set forth by the Christian church for itself and the Bible were announced to the world now for the first time, as they were in Judea 1,800 years ago, they would be deemed by all intelligent people beneath contempt; just as the Mormon religion is now rejected by the greater part of Christendom and the rest of mankind. But with many thousands these church ideas are accepted implicitly because they were instilled into their minds from infancy, and they hav never for a moment doubted their truth. Not having examined the subject they hav no proper idea at all of their intrinsic nonsensicality.

What Is Religion?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The following views are based upon personal experiences, observations, and the records. I will not dwell at length on dead issues, the present and future concerning the living. History is a luxury to leave or take. It is not useful, excepting as a romance to amuse or entertain. It cannot take away nor modify the value of the arts and sciences. We possess them. What matters it from whence they hav originated. On the other hand, history perpetuates an animosity which has from time to time sprung up between the races for reasons more or less arbitrary.

Religion is a history of mental experiences, which certain people hav adopted at different periods. The more progressive the age the more liberal the creed of that age, but I fear that the epoch is far distant when all men will be entirely liberal and logical in their views. In point of fact, we find a singular inconsistency in (the amalgamation of logic with illusion) some of our expert logicians indulging in extravagant chimeras, and making acts of faith to which their logic givs the lie continually.

Religion is a matter of opinion, based principally upon the experiences or the imaginations of the past, and accepted by men as a duty to be observed. Education breeds religion, and Liberalism destroys it, because Liberal ideas hav an innate repugnance for rules that impose restraint upon thought.

A truism is only true to those who are mentally capable of understanding it. To all others who accept it, it is an article of faith. I do not mean to advance that it is wrong for certain majorities of intellects to be guided by the views of other intellects, but the freedom which I concede to those majorities I claim as my most sacred prerogative. If they claim the right to follow a leader, I shall claim that right. My leader is my reason. As it is, that reason may be at fault, their leader may likewise err. Let all hav the right of choosing their mental leader. To say that the people can now dispense entirely with religion would, in my estimation, be anticipating the progress of civilization.

I consider religion a necessity, aye, indispensable to an immense majority of the people. Those who hav studied its influences cannot fail to appreciate its importance. There are communities even in our American sphere which would become intolerable outside of religious restraint. Who can doubt it?

If, then, religion is a necessity under our Liberal (or semi-Liberal) regime, how much more a necessity, is it not, under less Liberal and enlightened governments? What is desirable, and should be maintained as sacred by all, is tolerance. Let all men be guided by the leaders of their choice. Let no faction or sect, religiously, morally, nor politically speaking, infringe upon these sacred prerogatives of the citizen which hav formed the corner-stone of American progress and prosperity—civil rights or the right to be let alone.

Down and Out.

Here comes the "whirligig of time" again, with another of its revenges. The founder of the Index and of the Liberal League, but jerked out by the nape of the neck before he could be the founderer of that noble organization, has come to the end of his rope—or rather the day is fixed for his dangling from that end. For two years he and the Index hav lived at a poor dying rate, out of harmony with all Liberalism and not even in unity with himself—and now the "approaching separation" has come.

The mere fact of Mr. Abbot's withdrawal from the editorship of the Index would be a subject, for any writer noting it, to treat with leniency, with clemency, with some humane regret, with award of credit for so long an effort to improve at least the religion of the world. And Mr. Abbot might hav secured some degree of this kind of appreciative consideration had he chosen to extend it to others as he retires. But he does nothing of the kind. He leaves the scene of what has been a fruitless labor to him, darting Parthian arrows as he goes. He retires with yelps and snarls and gnashing of teeth. He can fairly expect nothing but blow for bite, to the end of his hydrophobic life. If he could be adjudged insane and not responsible for his calumnies, it would no doubt be a great relief to his friends; but there is too much method in his malignancy to allow it to pass for madness. Few things in his public life became him worse than the manner of his leaving it, and his latest lies should be met with all the vigor of the first.

From being the founder and leader of a great League he has dropped down and down till he becomes the leader of a baker's dozen of baker's dough-faces, weakly animated by a rage for culture but with no virile purpose or able-bodied object in life. In December, 1877, on the first arrest of Mr. Bennett, the editor of the Index and President of the League took issue with nine-tenths of the Liberals of this country on the question of the repeal of the Comstock Laws. That was the first step which cost—that was his entrance on the downward path which led him and all his then great influence to the outskirts of Liberalism, the border land of Christianity where abundance of such wisdom as his crieth in the streets and no man regardeth. These two years hav been one long and, to him, severe struggle for supremacy, with constant and successive defeat for him. With one against thousands the results could not long be doubtful. Within a year from his first breaking ground against the live issues of Liberalism he came before the Annual Congress of the League for re-election as its President, and was promptly rejected. That was his first decisive cataclysmic defeat. Meantime another defeat more gradual, in the nature of slow suffocation for which he knew no remedy, was going on. Subscriptions for the Index fell off, the circulation ran down, even the annual assessments pledged by the stockholders were repudiated; and finding himself without an audience, writing and editing with no readers, he givs up the editorial ghost in an open letter to the few remaining subscribers to the Index announcing his "approaching separation." Some of his last words are these:

> One thing should be distinctly understood: my retirement is the result, simply and solely, of the non-payment of their annual stock assessments by stockholders of the Index Association to the amount of about fifty thousand dollars—more than half of the amount due. The capital stock of one hundred thousand dollars was originally all subscribed for, payable ten per cent annually for ten years. Some of the subscribers hav proved unable, and others indisposed, to redeem these pledges; but if all who are able to pay were willing to pay, the Index Association would now be on a sound financial basis. With no little hesitation I embarked in the enterp ise at the outset, postponing plans of most important philosophical work for an indefinite period, because I saw the great immediate necessity to the Free Religious movement of a first-class journal equal to the best English periodicals in all respects, and because I reposed implicit confidence in the honesty and honor of the stock-subscribers. This confidence has not been fully justified, but the necessity still remains. The Index Association has at last proved to be a failure; but the Index has not been a failure. On the contrary, if you and the public choose to make it so, it may yet become a great and permanent success, even in the financial sense. I earnestly desire that you and they will emphatically declare that it shall be a success.

From which it appears that the stockholders, able but not willing to pay their annual stock assessments, had no other means of dislodging this incompetent editor but to withhold the supplies and starve him out. He says he "reposed implicit confidence in the honesty and honor of the stock subscribers," but the stock subscribers probably retort the same thing on the editor and say, "we reposed implicit confidence in the honesty, honor," and ability of the editor; but, these failing in him, the necessity of his remaining does not still remain.

He says, "the Index has not been a failure." This is of a piece with the President of the League, when he got home from Syracuse all knocked to pieces, shouting "victory!" How is it that the Index is not the same failure that its editor is? If stockholders and subscribers and the Liberal public generally, on the faith that the editor had tact and sense as well as editorial ability, ran up the circulation to a fair and encouraging if not paying figure; and then, suddenly, the editor, in a fit of personal jealousy and spite, turned a short corner against the main army of Liberalism and against the objects of its organization and ran the subscription down to a vanishing point, only a corporal's guard of personal adherents remaining, what else could constitute a failure of the paper along with its editor? His statements. "if subscribers choose to make it so it may become," under another editor "a great and permanent success," don't save the paper as well as its present editor from being now a shameful failure.

But here is the end of a sad career. Life must seem to Mr. Abbot not worth living. He must hav hopes that death does end all. His discouraged confession, "I do not abandon my post of my own free will; I would hav sooner dropped dead in my tracks; I go only because I must," is the most touching of all, and is enough to draw tears from the bitterest of his aforetime friends whom he so needlessly made his dearest enemies. His case is a warning to all the younger sons of Liberalism taking up the battle descended from their sires.

Not another Liberal captain in this generation will assume to lead without thoroughly knowing the object of the conflict, without ability to keep the main question in view, without the faculty of recognizing the uniform of his own soldiers, without the hearty co-operation of his own staff, or especially with liability to a craze which may turn his artillery upon his own regiments of the line.

OUT AND UP.

But curiously enough, by one of those strange coincidences that almost justify the belief that there is a Supreme Stage Manager up aloft, with an eye to startling situations, directing this life drama, at the moment that Mr. Abbot speaks his farewell piece and disappears from the scene his great rival, Mr. Bennett, makes his debut before an audience of which any Liberal Kean or Kemble might be proud, and receives an ovation and a triumph unexampled in the history of first appearances. Just look at the contrast. Mr. Bennett began his little paper four or five years after Mr. Abbot did his, with only a few hundred dollars capital, unfriended and alone, a stranger in a strange city, with no TRUTH SEEKER Association and $100,000 capital subscribed, payable in annual ten per cent assessments that would giv him $10 000 capital every year to go upon. No such encouraging staff as this had he to lean upon. He had only his own indomitable courage, his untiring industry, his personal frugality and business economy, his stalwart common sense, his clear perceptions of the kind of Liberal paper the people like, and his thorough apprehension of the objects of the war between Freethought and Christianity. These he had to rely upon, and with these he has made a success. Persecutions and prosecutions hav only carried him further and higher on the road to greater success. Every effort of this same Abbot and his Index to crush his invulnerable and inexpugnable rival, at hundreds or perhaps thousands of dollars of expense to the Index treasury, has rained down more subscribers and other sources of profit into Mr. Bennett's pocket. Even his persecutions and prosecutions and his year of imprisonment scarcely retarded his "go-as-you-please" march. His faults, if he has any, are only those of a personal and private nature, with which the public has nothing to do. They do not affect the quality of his paper, and the public recognize that fact and support him. On the contrary, the editor of the Index ostensibly keeps himself unspotted from the world, prides himself on his culture, boasts of possession of all the virtues, and—tumbles into the limbo of the unfit to survive. It is not the man with no faults, or rather with no defiances of Christian conventionalities, that succeeds, but it is the man with no manliness, the man with toadyisms and compliances, and emasculations that fails. The world will any day trade, with large odds to boot, Mr. Abbot's culture and purity and virtue, even if they are not assumed and questionable, for Mr. Bennett's downright honesty and courage and clear conception of the line of battle and where to find the enemy, and his unswerving adherence to the main cause and the whole of it. Washington was none the less the father of his country if he did swear like a trooper and break a Mosaic commandment.

> "What boots it thy virtue.
> What profit thy parts,
> While one thing thou lackest,
> The art of all arts?"

That one thing is tact and the ability to divine and dive for the central core of things. Mr. Abbot has it not, and with all his props he fails. Mr. Bennett has it, and with all his handicapping he succeeds. T. C. LELAND.

The Universal Federation of Freethinkers.

BRUSSELS, Mar. 30, 1880.

MR. A. L. RAWSON, SECRETARY OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE OF THE UNITED STATES OF NORTH AMERICA:

You are doubtless aware that the Universal Federation of Freethinkers is in process of formation. It is composed at present of two great English secular societies—the National Secular Society and the British Secular Union—which hav sixty-eight branches; the National Liberal League of the United States of North America, which has one hundred and eighty-eight auxiliaries; the Federated Rationalistic Societies of Belgium, as well as the Freethinkers of Brussels and Antwerp; a group of Freethinkers in Holland, and of other similar societies.

We hav thought that the first act by which this federation might be in great measure established should be an International Congress of Freethinkers, which has already met at Amsterdam in 1859, and at Naples in 1869, and the idea has been favorably received.

Brussels has been chosen for its central position, and we hav thought it well to profit by the public fetes which the Belgian government has organized for this year.

We hav therefore the honor to present you herewith a project for the regulation of the Congress, and we ask you,

(A) As the president or secretary of branches, auxiliaries, or Rationalistic federations, lay communities, or Masonic lodges,

1. That you assure us of the co-operation of your society, a union that will not embarrass in any manner an entrance into the universal federation.

2. To inform us of the number of your delegates.

3. To at once study the Order of Exercises, to gather necessary documents, and to make one or more reports on the condition of Freethought in your country. You can determine whether your work is printed or not in any of the local papers, and if not printed, forward it to us in MSS. In this last case we beg of you to hav it sent as soon as possible.

4. To hav furnished us by your most competent writers essays on the third and fourth topics in the Order of Exercises of the Congress.

(B) If you reside in a country where there are no Freethought organizations, although not wanting partisans—

1. To personally join the Congress, and giv us the names of others in your neighborhood, with whom we may correspond.

2 To request one or more of your acquaintances, who cannot attend the Congress, to giv us a general report or partial essays on some one or more of the subjects in our Qrder of Exercises.

You will notice, Mr. Rawson, the great importance to all of making known to us the true situation in each country, and to discuss in common the topics that will engage the Congress.

These questions that we propose to you seem to us to interest all, without giving rise to irritating debates.

We hope that you will aid us in preparing and in making a success of this work. We are convinced that it can only be carried out with results that will be worthy of our cause by the union of all free spirits who will bring us the fruit of their observations and of their special studies.

Will you accept, etc.

Congress of 1880.—Order of Exercises.

Art. 1. A Congress of the Universal Federation of Freethinkers will assemble at Brussels in the coming month of August, 1880.

It will be composed—

1. Of delegates from societies or federations of Rationalists, and from Masonic lodges, members.

2. Of persons admitted to represent countries where there are no similar organizations.

Preparatory Work.

Art. 2. The preparatory work of the Congress is of two kinds—recruiting members of the Congress and the preliminary study of the subjects in the Order of Exercises.

Membership of the Congress does not imply membership of the federation.

Art. 3. A Council of Organization is charged with the direction of the work. It is composed of fifteen members, elected by the Commission of Direction of the Freethinkers of Brussels, and by the Federal Council of the Federated Rationalistic societies of Belgium.

Art. 4. The Council named an Executive Commission composed of six members.

Art. 5. The number of delegates members of the Congress is fixed as here stated:

1. Each affiliated society may be represented by at least two, and by ten at the most.

2 The delegates from countries in which there are no sufficiently similar organizations will be admitted by the Executive Committee.

Art. 6. The expenses of the Congress will be borne by the members in proportion to their voluntary assessments, and also by personal subscriptions.

Art. 7. The members are invited to publish, on the questions in the Order of Exercises of the Congress, their personal studies or compilations, which may be presented to the Council of Organization, or to send at least an analysis to the members of the Congress.

Art. 8. A scheme for the regulation of the Universal Federation will be prepared and submitted to the auxiliary members without delay by the Council of Organization.

Work of the Congress.

Art. 9. After a report, presented in the name of the Council, in explanation, on the verification of the powers and organization, the Congress will constitute its bureau for the election of a president, four vice presidents, and six member, to which will be added a treasurer of the Executive Commission and four secretaries for the different languages named by it.

Art. 10. The Congress will devote three days to its meetings, private and public, and also one solemn session with closed doors.

Art. 2.—1. The History and Condition of Freethought.—An inquiry bearing particularly on the number of societies, the methods they employ, the principles they sustain, the exercise which occupy their members, the statistics of the civil laymen and school laymen, the state of legislation, and the divers points where it is seen that new liberations are gained, and on the general progress of Liberalism.

2. The Universal Federation of Freethinkers —The study, the discussion, and the vote of the organization.

3. The study of the preliminary reports and of the discussions of Congress, of the two questions following:

On Free Will.—On the gifts science, observation, and experiment furnish on this problem, and on the consequences of a solution of the question from a sociological point of view.

On Morals —The necessity in modern society to establish and maintain a system of morals independent of religious ideas.

Art. 12. Other questions may be proposed before the 1st of June, 1880, at the latest, to the Executive Commission, who will submit them to the Council of Organization, and, in case of a division in opinion, to the Congress.

Art. 13. No other subject besides those in the Order of Exercises will be discussed in the Congress. The Bureau and the President will see that the speakers do not vary from the programme.

Art. 14. No member can speak until he is recorded and in his turn.

Art. 15. The delegates from branches, members of the Universal Federation, will alone vote on this business of the Order of Exercises, and each society will hav but one vote.

Art. 16. In general, the Congress will not vote. If other votes are admitted by the Bureau, they will not bind the conduct of the societies nor the consciences of their members.

Art. 17. The use of the various languages is at the option of the Congress.

Art. 18. The Council of Organization will publish a full report of the work of the Congress, audit the accounts, and execute the resolutions.

Art. 19. The Universal Federation will fix the date and the place of the new Congress.

For the first time in the history of our era an international meeting of union and fraternity among Freethinkers of many nations and many languages is about to become a fact, "full of hope for all lovers of freedom, full of menace to all the tyrants of the world." The church has its organizations in all countries, and its system for enslaving the minds of men and women and biasing little children in very complete order. Now that Freethinkers hav gained freedom of conscience, it is their duty and opportunity to work for the emancipation of all men and women from the toils of ignorance and superstition. This is to be the work of the Congress at Brussels—to gather information from various countries on the condition of our great cause and to compare notes as to the methods of advancing it.

The Liberals of the United States can profit by this grand occasion to make themselves felt through able representatives in the World's Congress of Liberals, and so broaden and deepen their sympathy for humanity and increase their zeal in the good work. A small contribution from the many members of the National Liberal League, and from Liberals generally, will pay the expenses of one or more delegates to the Congress. The notice of the appointment of such a delegate must be forwarded so as to reach Brussels by June 1st, and action must be prompt to enable us to carry out the programme.

While the Evangelical Alliance and other Christian associations are able to expend many thousands in sending their delegates to distant countries, the vast number of Liberals, if as well organized, could equal, if not surpass, them in their exertions. Their motive is to keep the people in ignorance and mental bondage; ours is to instruct and emancipate; and sacrifice in our cause is more honorable and worthy of praise. Contributions for this purpose may be sent to this office, and will be acknowledged in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The Board of Directors of the N. L. L. will select the delegation. A. L. RAWSON, Sec. N. L. ## W. S. Bell in the Buckeye State.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: W. S. Bell delivered a course of lectures for the Portage County Liberal Society at Ravenna, Ohio, commencing May 10th; subject, "Hell, Bigotry, and Intolerance;" May 11th, "Infidelity, Freethought, and Science;" May 12th, "Revivals of Religion vestiges of Barbarism." Notwithstanding that these lectures were the first of the kind ever delivered in this place, in which it is only by the hardest work that the Universalists are able to support their church, the audiences were very good; for when it is taken into consideration that President Rexford of Bucthtel College, who lectured here a short time ago upon "Col. Ingersoll and his Audiences," had no larger house, there is no harm in our saying "good" with the "very." Even Mr. Rexford's lectures were considered so near to that of an Infidel that some of our orthodox brethren thought that such a man ought not to be allowed to speak in the place. What think they now?

Mr. Bell is a fine speaker, handling his subjects with an ease that shows plainly that he is well acquainted with both sides of the questions which day by day are becoming of more interest to Freethinkers. He is an earnest worker in the Liberal movement, and one who should be kept constantly at work. R. A. HASBROUCK.

From Elmina.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I drop a line to say the big book came all right and in nice order, and I hav read fifty pages of it and like it ever so much, and will try and say more about it by and by.

Married on Sunday, April 4, 1880, Oscar G. Slenker and Inez E. Palmer.

"He is the crown of her life;
He finds in her forgetfulness of strife,
Something to charm e'en weary thought away,
And fill each passing hour with brightest ray."

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: When I find a real good thing I always want my friends to know, love, and appreciate it, and as I class all readers of my pet paper among my best friends. I hav gained Mr. Bennett's permission to tell you, through its columns, what I think of Harper's Young People. It is now twenty-eight weeks old, and I hav read every number of it from beginning to end, and pronounce it excellent. It is just the thing for children, little and big, and they are all crazy for it. My numbers all go over Snowville, and way out in the country besides. The articles are interesting, instructive, and amusing. They are historical, philosophical, poetical, comic, and humorous. Fact, fiction, and natural history, puzzles, riddles, and plays fill its pages, which are all illustrated by excellent engravings, some of which are real gems of art. Even the letters from the wee, wee little ones are nice and interesting. I hope you who are fathers and mothers will send for at least one specimen copy; and those who are not blessed with children can do as I do, take a copy for the children of your neighbors, and thus make glad many a little heart and do a good deed besides.

There is no amusement that is more pleasing, as well as instructive and entertaining than good reading, and I assure you, my friends, you will find Harper's Young People the best weekly paper for the young that has ever been gotten up. Address, Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, New York. $1.50 a year; single copies 4 cents.

Book Notices.

THE GODS AND RELIGIONS OF ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES. New York: D. M. Bennett, Liberal and Scientific Publishing House, 141 Eighth street. 1880. Volume I.

This is the first of two volumes, the second of which is now in press, written by D. M. Bennett during his incarceration in the Albany Penitentiary. He had been convicted of mailing an indecent book, in regard to which he says in the Preface to this volume: "The charge is wholly unjust. The little argumentative and philosophical work upon which I was convicted contains not a word that is obscene, and is couched in as unobjectionable language as any philosophical work of the kind. . . . My conviction was a foregone conclusion, and my trial a very unfair one—a mere mockery of justice—the object being to crush me and my business. The instigator of the prosecution [Comstock]. the prosecuting attorney [Woodford], his assistant [Fiero], the judge [Benedict], and the jury, were orthodox, and religious opponents and enemies. I was prepared to show by the first booksellers, writers, authors, philologists, and experts in the country that the work is not obscene. This privilege was denied me. I was not allowed to show the purpose and object of the work. I was not allowed to hav it in its entirety read to the jury. I was not allowed to compare it with numerous standard works sold daily by all dealers. The rulings and decisions of the Court were against me in every instance, and the charge to the jury was of the same character. The same rulings and instructions would convict every bookseller in the country."

The volume before us comprises nearly 900 pages, and contains a concise description of the gods and the worship of the gods of the Hindoos, of Persia, Egypt, China, Greece, Rome, the Norsemen, African tribes, American savages, and of the Semitic races, from whom the gods and worship of our own time in civilized countries are derived. It would be impossible in a short article to review in detail the multitude of subjects covered. There is no pretense of originality; the book is a collection of materials that hav heretofore been scattered in various books, some well known and others obscure, and the general purpose in bringing together under the eye of the reader all the religions of the world, ancient and modern, is apparently to expose the popular creeds of to-day by showing their relationship to and origin in the forgotten or cast aside creeds of the past.

The investigation of the worship of the Bible, and the acceptance of Jesus as a mediator between man and the Almighty, is thorough, and the objections in most respects unanswerable. In discussing the former, the history of all the books of the Bible is given from Genesis to Revelations, and a multitude of popular errors respecting authorship, prophecy, and the fulfillments of prophecy are exposed from the text itself. The utter untrustworthiness of the book of the New Testament, as evidence of the divinity of Jesus, or even as evidence of his sayings and doings, is demonstrated by their history, and the striking, though not original, argument is advanced that inasmuch as the authenticity of these books was in doubt for the 500 years immediately following the obscure events to which they relate, it is rather severe to punish with hell-fire doubts arising 1,500 years later, especially as the original doubts were [illegible] by a succession of conventions, composed of ignorant, superstitious, self-seeking, and confessedly uninspired priests, whose votes rejected or received the copy of a copy of a manuscript (the origina of which had long since disappeared) as a part of the Word of God.

Mr. Bennett gives 515 principal impossibilities and improbabilities appearing in the Old and New Testaments. Some of the most striking we transcribe:

That the earth is older than the sun.

That Cain should find a wife when his mother was the only woman living.

That the Polar bear from the Arctic regions, the reindeer from the frozen North, the lions and tigers from the tropics, the kangaroo from Australia, the sloth—an exceedingly slow traveler—from South America, with all the rest from all latitudes and climes, including all the insects and worms, which hardly ever make long journeys, should be able to make the trip and arrive just in time, and all be ready to go in (the ark) together at the right moment and in good military order.

That the animals, fowls, and insects could liv over a year in Noah's big box without appropriate food.

[Mr. Bennett forgets that with God all things are possible.]

That the land should be completely filled with frogs, so that they should even get into the kneading trough, especially when there was no water in the country.

That inasmuch as the sun and moon were thus [by Joshua] delayed the length of a whole day, making that day as long as two days, the inhabitants of other nations and in other countries knew nothing about it nor spoke of the remarkable phenomenon.

That Matthew, in giving the genealogy of Jesus to show that he descended from David, should giv the genealogy of Joseph, who he immediately declares was not the father of Jesus.

That Matthew should be able to narrate the particulars of the transfiguration on the Mount when Moses and Elias appeared, when he was not present, while John, who, he says, was present, has not a word to say about it.

That, being hungry, Jesus should approach a fig-tree in the time of year when not in bearing, and because he found no figs upon it, get angry, and curse it so it died.

That John, like Mark, should think the ascension of Jesus into heaven of insufficient consequence even to allude to it.

Besides the list of impossibilities and improbabilities, several pages are given to a catalogue of contradictions, and one page is devoted to a reference to obscenities. Of this the author says: "It is not the purpose here to quote the obscene chapters and verses alluded to, for one reason, that they would very likely be distasteful to the reader, and for another, that it might subject the writer to another prosecution and imprisonment." But it occurs to us that Mr. Bennett does not evade the penalty. He refers by number to chapter and verse, and as the law prohibits the circulation of anything giving information where obscene literature may be obtained, he is clearly guilty of another violation. However, he might reasonably expect the Bible Society to defend him in any such event, if from no other motive, at least to establish precedent for their own protection.

In concluding his first volume the author refers to the manifold conceded errors of the Bible as an argument against its unquestioned adoption as the inspired word of a perfect God. "The American Bible Society," he says, "in 1847 appointed a committee of its members to prepare a standard edition of the King James version free from typographical errors. They prepared such an edition, correcting, as they stated, 24,000 errors, but so alarmed did they become at the attacks made upon it that it was withdrawn, and the American Bible Society continues to this day to print and send over the world a book as 'the word of God,' containing, by their own admission, 24,000 errors."

Mr. Bennett's book is an interesting one to read, and valuable for reference, containing, as it does, within its pages not alone his own statements of facts, arguments, and opinions, but also those of the principal authors who hav written upon the subjects which he presents. No matter what conclusion he may reach, no person can intelligently understand or discuss the Bible, its claim to divinity, or its contents, without having gone over the same ground that Mr. Bennett covers in his work.—Truth.

Every God a Liar.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The New York Herald denounces Col. Ingersoll's lecture last Sunday evening at Booth's Theatre as "vulgar." The Telegram says, "Ingersoll is to religion what Kearney is to politics."

As both these assertions are absolutely untrue, they are added proofs of what we wrote last week: "It is the well settled policy of the Christian press to denounce every public meeting that Liberals hold as immoral and obscene, no matter how orderly or how carefully expressed the speeches are."

The Liberals of this country will find such comfort as they can in one of the consolations of Shakspere: "Virtue itself 'scapes not calumnious strokes;" and, "be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny."

Liberals, remember this and go on with your work.

T. C. L.

MR. D. B. CRISSEL, Republic, Seneca Co., Ohio, writes, "There are quite a number of Liberals in this community, and we are willing to do all we can for the cause." Will those Liberals please aid Mr. Crissel in the formation of a Liberal League? They need not be at a loss for a good name at any rate, if they will call their League after the philosopher whose name they bear.

True Courage.

Fellow-workers in the great Liberal field, whose main object is the possession of truth, I trust that all of us perceive the necessity of manifesting toward one another a spirit of broad and generous catholicity. The great trouble with all schools of aggressive thought against superstition, priestly dictation, and political domination has ever been the determination of each particular faction or phase of reform to exhibit in a measure the same narrowness (to other honest workers) as the venders of creeds manifested toward them.

As no effect can exist without a cause to produce it, it is evident that an evil so universal must be the legitimate outcome of influences that must be corrected ere the reign of human rights will be established and the laws of equity respected.

There is a vast amount of folly exhibited and valuable time wasted in pruning trifling wrongs from the tree of evil and allowing it to rest undisturbed in the rich soils that sustain its roots and body.

We dwell too little on the few simple and natural rights that inure to each individual, a knowledge and practice of which secure to him or her all the liberties the individual mind and body can enjoy or retain, and which, in their simple, natural use, cannot conflict with the equal rights of others.

There seems nothing more difficult than definitions, and there certainly is nothing more confusing than much of the interpretation. This is not to be wondered at by those whose interest lies in misrepresenting us; 'tis strange on the part of those claiming to work with us.

There are some grand principles on which most men agree, viz, these: That we hav an undoubted right to think as we please; to use our highest reason in criticising and investigating all propositions that bear directly or indirectly on the happiness or misery of the human race; that he or she is a bigot that will not at once concede this right without an if or a but. They will admit also that human beings are entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that as no individual, or class of individuals, ever hav, or ever can be, endowed by nature with any more than these principles or truth contain. We are each the peer of the other, and, in the simple measure of right, a unit.

When we begin to work out in detail the principles on which, as a whole, we are in perfect accord, then commences the trouble. We classify ourselves into different schools, and take for our cardinal principle some particular thought, around which cluster and revolve the sum of our emotions, the result of our reason, and the strength of our desires. In proportion as these crystallize into positive shape do they form repellant angles toward other schools whose central thought differs from ours.

In the defense of what each school deems an essential truth, they violate a principle on which all rights are based, viz, the right of each individual member of the race.

In no direction is this evil more manifest than in the narrowness of those who claim to belong to the friends of universal freedom and justice.

Imagine for one moment the absurdity of the position those occupy who limit the principle of the largest liberty of mind and body to the masculine sex; who think women are good enough for cooks and baby-factories, but quite unfit as law-makers and physicians. I want to be patient, and mean to be just, but 'tis almost more than I can tolerate and endure to hear a party of Liberalists vent their spleen against the church and priesthood for their bigotry, and then join hands with these twin evils by saying they are not quite prepared to see women vote.

The simple truth is that justice, equity, or even ordinary common sense, knows no distinctions on account of sex or color. No principles in nature, be they morals or physics, but are equally good and potent, whether enunciated by man or woman.

The discoveries in science by Miss Mitchell, Somerville, and numerous other women, were quite as good as though they had been filtered through the brain of Miss Mitchell's father or any other masculine professor.

The chisel in the hand of Harriet Hosmer, the book and pencil in the hand of Rosa Bonheur, the histrionic talents of a Rachel, Siddons, Ristori, and a Bernhardt, and the brilliant pens of women that hav and still enrich literature, as well as the grand army of women orators, all evidence their equality with us.

This question should be so settled in the minds of all true Liberal workers that they should hav the courage to express and defend it.

Passing beyond all contention on the question of any difference in right on account of the difference in sex, we shall find that we occupy a decided advantage over those that still hesitate about what constitutes woman's rights and woman's sphere.

Conceding, what we hav so long hesitated to concede (and which has demonstrated more clearly than anything else our cowardice and despotism), that women are entitled to all the advantages and privileges that men enjoy, will open the greatest flood-gates of agitation that ever agitated this or any other people.

In the coming fight there is no room for cowards. Courage of the most positive kind is needed, for rest assured that just as soon as women hav an equal voice in the family, the church, and state, "all hell may not be let loose," but very much of the hell that curses the family circle and hangs like gangrene on the body politic will be cut loose, and those who now rule the church and the devoted sisterhood will find their empty honors, with their silly robes, slipping from them.

Those who to-day are afraid of the investigation that "Cupid's Yokes" invites, will discover that this little disturber of orthodox and Bundy-Underwood-Abbot peace is a very courteous and needed intruder.

Oh, yes, when women are allowed the right to expose the brutality and tyranny that curses the present order of married life, there will be many a man made better, or he will find a new boarding house. The weeding-out process will not be confined to the drunkards. The saints, moralists, and Liberalists, in part, will be weighed in the balance of a wife-justice and found wanting.

Many, very many, poor slaves who linger out miserable lives as the result of forced maternity will rejoice at their deliverance, and the obscenity that Comstock justifies will find no refuge in true homes. As the home is the foundation of all good and all evil, let us use our best endeavors to make it what it should be.

When I consider the simplicity of this question of human rights, I am astonished that it seems so little understood. It is not possible for any one to be unjust who keeps in view a very few simple propositions. The truth that we can only possess the same degree of latitude of thought that we accord to others, that we can only so act as not to infringe on their equal right to act, and that it is as unreasonable for us to find fault with them for seeing different from us in matters of science, religion, morals, and politics, as it would be for them to find fault with us, are axioms that cannot be disputed.

Do we follow these to their legitimate results, there will be no room for Materialists or Spiritualists to cavil or fret over any mental conclusion one or the other may make. Our sincerity for the general good should unite us. We fight a common enemy—one that opposes the method of each and all of us to search for truth.

Though a very decided Spiritualist—decided, because evidence has come to my own sense of touch, sight, and thought that nothing but the spiritual philosophy makes reasonable—I hav, nevertheless, found in the Material ranks some of the grandest of human souls, men and women. Their aid is invaluable; they aid us in the best possible relations to our line of thought, and enable us to sift more clearly the evidence that sustains us.

There is too much needed and practical work for us to do to waste our time in pouting and making faces at each other. Women that hav done so much of late years to help on the cause of human progress are going to ask every true man just where he stands. Those that respond aright will need courage; those that lack this article may ask John C. Bundy where he and Mr. Abbot will place them. The signs are ominous. Who knows but, after all, Mr. Heywood may take a front seat and Comstock a baggage-car?

W. S. Bell in South Cleveland.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. W. S. Bell delivered two lectures here on April 28th and 29th. In the first the speaker demonstrated the folly and lack of reason in the belief in hell most admirably, The second lecture was in answer to the question, "What does Freethought Offer in place of Christianity?" The subject was handled with ability.

In this lecture Mr. Bell spoke in a very touching manner of the persecution of D. M. Bennett, the man who had suffered more for free thought, free speech, a free press, and free mails than any other living man. He rejoiced to know that at that moment Mr. Bennett was at liberty.

The lecturer commanded the closest attention throughout and was frequently applauded. Mr. Bell speaks fluently, reasons logically, and gives universal satisfaction. We earnestly hope that he may be kept constantly employed, as there is much work to be done.

Sydney Smith on Comstock-Crosby Societies.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Did any of your readers ever read the essays of the Rev. Sydney Smith? I hope some hav and that all others will read them, for possibly they may thereby become inspired with the glorious spirit of their author. What a reasoner he was! Nothing can stand before his logic. And how he does destroy all cant, sham, and humbug when he gets at them! How fair, how just, he is! His splendid and solid talent and his high position as a minister in the church of England gave him most wonderful authority. What a legacy are his writings! but alas, our people read nothing now except newspapers and trashiest novels. I wish to call the attention of your thousands of readers to what Sydney Smith says about our Comstock-Crosby institutions for the suppression of vice. As no one, hardly, can get hold of Smith's Essays' unless in the larger cities, it may be interesting. In the essay in the Edinburgh Review, year 1800, entitled "Proceedings of the Society for the Suppression of Vice," he begins: "The object of such a society must at first sight conciliate the favor of every respectable person; and he who objects is bound to giv good reasons. . . We certainly hav had doubts and now think we must state them." He says that though informers may be useful, etc., it by no means follows to combine, make a public purse, and prosecute. "An informer is in general a man of very indifferent character. So much fraud and deception are necessary for carrying on his trade, it is so odious, that no man of respectability will ever undertake it."

Think of that, O Anthony and O Crosby! But to quote again about informers:

"It is evidently impossible to make such a character otherwise than odious. A man who receives weekly pay for prying into the transgressions of mankind and bringing them to punishment will always be hated by mankind, and the office must fall to the lot of men of desperate and ambiguous character. Such officers and their patronage become an evil as great as any sought to be suppressed. The alarm such private accusers create is known to be very great, not only to the guilty but to the timid, innocent, and ignorant; destruction of social confidence is another evil. An informer worms my secret out of me and betrays me. These evils may be tolerated on a small scale; on a large they become intolerable. Thirty or forty informers roaming about the city may frighten the mass of offenders and do some good; ten thousand would create an insurrection."

Let me add that the innocent may well fear in the United States, seeing that Heywood and Bennett are singled out for selling a harmless pamphlet, while the venders of Boccaccio and Balzac are unnoticed, and judges decide that "any book having substantial portions that are obscene is within the statute," and only the verses marked by the prosecution shall be considered or read on the trial to settle the question of obscenity. (How if we were to publish the thirty-sixth chapter of Isaiah or the eighteenth of 2 Kings?)

"But," continues Smith, "if once such a combination to suppress vice is allowed, where are its limits to be? What accused person dares stand against such a society? Their mandates would soon be law. Accusation would in such case be ruin. Individuals accuse at their own risk, which is a security against needless accusations—a security that cannot be had as against a large society to which pecuniary loss is of little consequence. It must not be forgotten that this is not a society for punishing but for accusing, and that before trial the accused is presumed innocent and must hav every fair chance of defense. [This is the very genius of our institutions.] He must be no common defendant who does not defend against such a society with very fearful odds—best counsel against him, great skill in the particular cause, witnesses thoroughly hackneyed in courts, and unlimited command of money, and influence of the names of the chief members of the society. 'Lord Radstock or the Bishop of Durham against a Whitechapel butcher!' Is this fair? It is not even so in London. What must it be in the country, with all the leading citizens, perhaps, on one side? It is even probable the defendant's accusers are his jury."

"If it is lawful for respectable men to combine for the purpose of turning informers, it is lawful for the lowest, most despicable race of informers to do the same—and then every species of extortion would result. We are rather surprised that no society of perjured attorneys and fraudulent bankrupts has risen up in the metropolis for the suppression of vice."

He adds that as the present society receives no members but those of the church of England, it is reasonable to suppose other exclusive societies may arise to suppress vice in aid of Methodism, Jacobinism, etc., etc. Because the object is good is no reason in its favor; if it is, then societies for procuring intelligence from foreign ports, voluntary transport and victualing societies—in short, every business and duty of government—should be duplicated. Such societies cannot be restrained within moderate bounds; the most violent and ignorant carry them against the rest. These societies produce a reaction and render opposition to them popular in time—always hav and always will; combinations to suppress are followed by combinations to encourage. [Tens of thousands hav read "Cupid's Yokes" who would never hav heard of it but for the outrage on Bennett; tens of thousands hav heard of Bennett since who never heard of Heywood before it occured.] "Violent methods of making people virtuous originated in darker ages than ours, when the science of government was ill understood. A suppressing society hunting everywhere for penalty will revive ancient fanaticisms." "As to a great many laws against immoralities, etc., it is impossible to enforce them, and well it is so. Any constable hearing one swearing profanely has a legal right to arrest him. Common sense, left to itself, silently repeals such laws. The object is all right, but the means are reprehensible."

"Beginning with the best intentions, such societies degenerate into the receptacles for tittle-tattle and malice. Ratcatchers love to catch rats, bug destroyers seize on bugs with delight, and the suppresser glories in finding his vice. He soon becomes a mere tradesman. . . . The society cannot be ignorant of the numbers of gambling-houses resorted to by men of fashion. Hav they attempted to suppress one? Can anything be more despicable than such partiality? Can any one suppose such a society will ever attack the vices of the fashionable? The members know very well such attempts would exclude them from elegant society. Nothing therefore remains but to rage against the Sunday dinners of the poor, and to prevent a laborer from losing on the first day that beard which has been augmenting during the other six. At present they should denominate themselves a society for suppressing the vices of persons whose incomes are less than £500 per annum [of Freethinkers]."

To show the absurdities into which that particular society had run he quotes from their proceedings a passage in which they boast of the good effects of their "warnings to booksellers, etc., against selling or exhibiting indecent publications," and "lament the extended establishment of circulating libraries whereby works of immoral and prurient nature are circulated."

"Than such conduct," says Smith, "nothing can be more presumptuous. The natural answer from these societies will be that we are lovers of vice, desirous of promoting indecency, destroying the Sabbath, etc. We calmly reply that we are neither so stupid nor so wicked as not to concur in every scheme to preserve rational religion and sound morality; but the scheme must be well concerted, and those who carry it into execution must deserve our confidence. Upon religion and morals depend the happiness of our race, but the fortune of knaves and power of fools are sometimes made to rest on the same apparent basis, and we will never willingly permit a rogue to get rich or a block head to get power under the sanction of these awful words. The cowardly and the mean can never be the friends of morality, the promoters of human happiness."

There, Mr. Editor, is the opinion of one who not only led the opinion of his day by his common sense, lofty position, and true nobility of soul, but who still continues to lead it through the spirit animating the works he has left to us, on almost every subject upon which he has spoken. There is his opinion of such societies. It must hav its proper weight with all thinking people who read it. Many who might never see his works will be enabled by this publication to read it. HOLT.

The Bennett Reception.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Convention on the occasion of Mr. Bennett's restoration to liberty was the best demonstration of the fact that Liberals know their rights, and fully resolve to obtain and enjoy them, that has been made since the late daring innovations on them by church tyranny. An annual mass convention in New York city discussing the relative right and practice hav to progress, would facilitate effort, do what the Liberal League Congress has not time for, and utilize radical force through reform branches.

Philanthropists would gladly hope that, knowing now so well that constant vigilance alone can secure freedom, the Liberal Leagues, laborers, and Freethinkers' compacts will multiply rapidly, and other important measures be instituted to form and unite a mighty phalanx with a view to political influence and governmental renovation. Until such influence is gained we only retard the determined despotism of sect and caste, and teach their councils to devise new and worse schemes to circumvent our efforts. Public sentiment has nobly honored and vindicated Bro. Bennett and the fearless TRUTH SEEKER, and my tears of joy hav kissed the fitting, printed utterances that welcomed him to sweet home and the continued production of the journal for the enlightening of educated ignorance. Vigilance must prevent more martyrs from suffering in dungeons to terrify the weak and make coward subjects of the many. What has appeared to some as reckless daring in those who hav been imprisoned is but straightforward obedience to natural rights and humane duties. The faults were of the many publishers and venders of literature who succumbed to threat and ostracism. Had all firmly sustained rights conferred by the Constitution, spurious, acts could not hav enabled inquisitors to convict any for true adherence. Those who trimmed their lamps of truth and firmly wrought for common welfare cannot be too highly esteemed. Of such are the teachings of people to compose a practical republic; of such will be the constructors of such republic.

Go on learning truth and teaching honesty and courage, Heywood, Bennett, Wright, Wakeman, Ingersoll, Roberts, and all the good, for universal reform must be reached. Falter not, true sisters, firm in freedom's van; Colby, liberating oracle of angels; Colman, ever dauntless; Post, grand in principle, act, and word; Slenker, tireless in argument and pen; and on whom shall Mott's bright mantle fall? All gaze, and echo answers, whom? In this full, populated land fewer women to face giant wrongs than in former perilous times. Contemplate the fact, philosophers, and note the duties some hav overlooked and all hav shirked. Does not the view show that depraved institutions, combining, hav existed on woman's ignorance and subjection, and will exist while they hold her stupid acquiescence in established shams? Can our radical knowledge, our understanding of liberty, graduate into legislation while motherhood is prostrate 'neath these stultifying powers, bearing slavish offspring, and nursing fashionable vices? Thinking men and women, looking for liberation from complex thraldom, here are queries that should arouse you to such action as was never yet exerted for human redemption. Instead of America expecting all her own to do their duty, we hav a few radicals praying to a few thousand more to learn duties than do them. Much learning must come into the work, for comparatively few men perceive that woman's individuality and action are as necessary to free minds and republicanism as theirs. In this, liberty differs from despotism; people look back and mix lessons. The great, good worker, Ingersoll, does not see but he can ever carry his consort vine twining as a vesture, and his daughter blossoms as gems in his bosom. President Wright is mindful that Mrs. Mott's quick courage inspired men to action, and says we rely on women to carry on the great battle for humanity, but does not inform us how they are to be brought to the work. I think men will make a path for them or tire of relying.

The meshwork of church society, in other words, popular respectability, forming the surface and order of things, must be broken into to extricate women who are the fibre and sustain the order. The quietness of liberty has allowed tyranny to adapt custom to its behest, and persistent labor must reform it from the base of physical energies.

Even Liberals still cling to that baleful responsibility, though so slavish and antagonistic to true life. As an indispensable measure in accomplishing Liberal work and ultimating success, people must be encouraged and sustained; especially must woman, in a revolt from present usage and an adoption of habits giving integral strength; both must be radical and independent enough to liv by their own standards of right in all things, and as they increase in numbers a better order of society will appear. Isolated communities do but little in this line; the work should permeate the masses, be done in their sight.

The sickly awe and fulsome flattery so long exerted over woman make man's firm aid a necessity in her release, his brave inspiration a need in her timidity for a time; but once aware of her latent power, will be an able ally in all good work, while old evils will be wakened by deserting forces and enemies obliged to accept equality. The sooner this trial is made a strong and definite part of all reforms, the earlier will the mutual labor of the sexes supplant oppression by the operations of sublime justice.

I think Pillsbury, Andrews, Leland, and many others see that woman's, as well as man's, adoption of self-directed liberty in all that is possible and good, must precede the inauguration of what is demanded; and, for the benefit of all in staying the spirit of prejudice, the persecution of bitterness, I appeal to them for expression on this department of the current campaign.

Efficiency, naturalness, and zeal for truth must somehow supersede the weakness and fictitiousness of woman, and this defensive struggle for rights, needing her co-action, her presence speaking for self-regard, for choice of place, for knowledge for herself and children, marks this a signal time for a wise departure in her modes and motives of action. Not to mention the gallantry, the dignity of Liberalism should now offer the ever withheld incentives to a free, worthy, and happy womanhood, for the sake of manhood no less, of general liberty more.

MARY E. TILLOTSON.

Book Notice.

THE GODS AND RELIGIONS OF ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES. By D. M. BENNETT. Vol. I. D. M. Bennett Publisher. New York, 1880.

Some books are remarkable not simply for what they are in themselves, but for the place in which they were written, and this book stands among the number. It was written in prison, by a convict, in the midst of hard work, and is certainly the result of immense industry and perseverance. But that convict was also a sufferer in behalf of mental liberty; and from this point of view the book acquires a much vaster meaning. It is a landmark in human effort and progress. It is the bold challenge of the human mind against chains and superstitions. It is the work of a dauntless soul that will not yield its birthright of freedom, but though the body is bound, will roam through all lands on the wings of thought, and with clear insight arrange for scientific inspection the gods who would fain overthrow the daring critic. But the critic has shown himself too much for all the gods, and they must hide their diminished heads as with swift and facile pen he flings them in panoramic display before the bar of common sense.

Not only the first volume of nearly a thousand pages has Mr. Bennett written during his eventful prison career, but a second volume of the same size, and "Behind the Bars," a book of nearly five hundred pages. This is something prodigious, considering that the writer could not, like many an ardent scholar, "burn the midnight oil," but had to go to bed at eight o'clock, and could not get up until a stated hour in the morning, and then only to wearing physical labor. The production of these three large books during a year's trying imprisonment looks very much like a miracle, as if somehow or other the angel of the Lord had given him a helping hand; but as the age of miracles is over, we must assume that Mr. Bennett accomplished the task by his own "innate, inborn gumption," which, after all, is the greatest of miracle-workers, and puts Jehovah entirely in the shade.

These books are worth reading simply as emanations from the prison-house of tyranny, showing that the unconquerable human mind will vindicate its heaven-born privilege of thinking, and send out its flashing rays, even though the body is clothed in the stripes of the slave.

This book is valuable because it gives from the Radical standpoint a philosophical and interesting account of the "gods." It shows them no favors, and yet I think it treats them fairly. They get all the credit they deserve; their good qualities are properly exhibited; their "supernatural" finery is taken off, as it should be; but whatever of "natural goodness" they may hav is well preserved. Man has made his own gods, and it isn't to be wondered at that at times he made some pretty good ones, like Jove and Baider, and Aphrodite and Agni. The good and bad hav been pretty freely mixed in these creations. Let one read and ponder for himself as he peruses these freighted pages, wherein the divinities of Hindoo, Persia, Chaldea, Egypt, China, Greece, Rome, the Norsemen, the tribes of Africa, and the Semitic races throng in varied garb and quality, and are seen to be mere reflections of human hope and fear and the multitudinous aspects of nature. The gods are now dethroned, but they still remain as very eminent curiosities. Mr. Bennett's book is a fine museum wherein one can see the poetry and romance as well as hideous nonsense and cruelty of defunct theologies. We advise the scientific student to enter and make a careful study of the fallen deities.

Mr. Bennett makes the Bible one of the "gods," and his treatment of it in this aspect is accurate and instructive. The Bible has been one of the worst of the gods, and has cursed humanity beyond words to express. It has been the guardian of ignorance, the protector of obscenity, the defender of slavery, the upholder of murder, the rewarder of hypocrisy. It has been a block to the wheels of human progress, and has done more to create insanity, bigotry, cruelty, malice, and hatred than any other influence. It has been a terrible god. Its thousand shrines are built upon blood. It is a mocker of human hope. Like the devil-fish, its million fangs clutch at the vitals of humanity. Mr. Bennett traces the history of this "god," shows that it is after all but a fallible literature, whose authorship for the most part is unknown; whose historic value is almost worthless; that it is made up of contradictions and impossibilities; that its patriarchs and prophets are no better than they should be, and its literary excellence by no means of the highest order. Mr. Bennett puts the Bible just where it ought to be—side by side with the Talmud and Koran and other religious books, worthy of the scholar's attention perhaps, but not of the man of action who has Shakspere, Dickens, and George Eliot to read.

The invocation to the universe is reverent in spirit and noble in thought. It is the true prayer of the heroic spirit. What more do we want than this mighty universe in which we liv. It is infinitely grander than all the deities ever conceived by human imagination. It is too great, too magnificent a thing to be called even a god. It is simply itself illimitable, splendid, powerful. To its unending majesty we bow.

Mr. Bennett's book is handsomely bound and contains a portrait of the author, which although adorned with the freshness of youth is yet a veritable presentment of the vigorous writer, and we expect that Mr. Bennett, now that he has "fought the good fight" will continually grow younger, and so the picture with its brilliancy of youthful bloom is but a prophecy of what he will be in a "green old age."

All Liberals should read this book, for knowledge is power, and it is well to know just how foolish mankind hav been in order to be able to make them better. As it is well to study a dead insect, so it is well to study a dead god. Neither the insect nor the god can sting us any more, and we can handle them without gloves. Mr. Bennett has placed them in conspicuous and orderly array and the result of vast reading and labor is put before the inquirer in a neat and vivacious manner. The book is a library in itself on a most important branch of human investigation.

S. P. PUTNAM.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am glad to know through the press, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Truth, that you are released from "durance vile" and safe "home again," if not "from a foreign shore," yet from a home—bastile—the effect of a law made by Christian bigots in the interest of the church.

Permit me to acknowledge the receipt, yesterday, of the first volume of your new work, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." I hav as yet only had time to giv it a passing glance, but its externals are all that the most fastidious critic could desire, and doubtless the extensiveness and accuracy of the researches of its author and publisher into the arcana of heathen and Christian mythology will forbid any important omissions or mistakes in matter or date.

Such a vast amount of knowledge condensed in one book will render it valuable for reference, aside from the use of the general reader. I trust it will be appreciated, and a large and immediate sale will testify to its merit and the esteem of its author, who must be possessed of a "miraculous" gift to bring out two such volumes while serving out a year's imprisonment for liberty of conscience and the right to a free press.

The many who will speak a good word for the book render it unnecessary for me to say more at the present time, so I leave it in their hands, assured that justice will be done in regard to such a valuable and immense work.

The First World's Congress of Freethinkers.

I hav received a circular call for a congress of Freethinkers to be held at Brussels, in Belgium, next August, signed by the Executive Committee of the Federation Universelle de Libres-Penseurs (Universal Society of Freethinkers), of which Dr. C. De Paepe is the correspondent in the English language. The National Liberal League at its last Congress at Cincinnati, passed a resolution of sympathy and fraternity with this society, which is also in accord with the National Secular Society, the British Secular Union, of England, and similar societies in Germany, France, and Belgium. The full text of the call will appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER next week. Friends of the National Liberal League, this is the opportunity to fraternize in fact with our co-workers in Europe by sending a delegation to represent the National Liberal League in this first world's congress of Freethinkers. A. L. RAWSON, Sec. N. L. L.

DEAR MR BENNETT: Please say in this week's TRUTH SEEKER, the special convention of the New England Free-love League meets in Science Hall, 718 Washington street, Boston, Sundays and Mondays, May 23 and 24th, and 30th and 31st. Three sessions daily. A. H. Wheeler, Angela T. Heywood, J. H. Sevoin, J. W. Stillman, E. H. Heywood speak.

The special convention of the New England Labor League meets in the same hall Sunday and Monday, May 16th and 17th. Good speakers and lively debates. And oblige, Yours ever, E. H. HEYWOOD.

THE Rev. George Chainey, of Evansville, Ind., who two weeks since startled the whole country by renouncing in his pulpit the Christian religion, writes to me in a private letter: "My congregation has refused to accept my resignation, and for the present I go on preaching the gospel of science and of mental liberty. I hav been almost sick for the past two days with the intensity of the excitement and sympathy with some good friends who are terribly grieved with my Radicalism. The price of liberty is still great though we escape the sword and the flame." Mr. Smith, of Evansville, Ind., has published a number of Mr. Chainey's recent discourses, which are for sale by him at five cents each, or for two and a half cents in larger orders. The most heretical are, "Heads and Hearts" and "Iconoclasm." Col. Ingersoll says of the last-named discourse, "It is the ablest production that has ever come from an American pulpit." No reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER should fail to order a package of these remarkable discourses for distribution. Direct, Mr. Smith, publisher, care Geo. Chainey, Evansville, Ind." H. L. GREEN.

Christian Falsehoods.

These seem ready to crop out and show themselves on all possible occasions. The Bennett Reception at Chickering Hall on the 2d instant was such an immense uprising of the people, such an emphatic protest against ecclesiastical tyranny and religious intolerance, such an ovation of welcome to one who had been unjustly cast into prison for opinion's sake, that our Christian opponents must needs bring their usual powers of falsehood and defamation into play, to, if possible, counteract and misrepresent this outpouring of the liberal-minded people of this great city. Lying telegrams were sent in all directions to head off the moral effect of this great outpouring of an indignant public, and the semi-religious press of the country was only too glad to spread the great misrepresentation all over the land. The old and favorite cries of "obscenity" and "blasphemy" were revived, and the religious papers, and the secular papers run in the interest of the Christian churches, immediately caught up the falsehood and spread it broadcast over the country. On another page in a letter from W. S. Bell attention is called to the false and malicious special telegram from this city to the Chicago Tribune in reference to the grand reception, in which numerous lies appear: "The proceedings were characterized by blasphemy and obscenity throughout, denunciations of religion and the clergy, blasphemeus allusions to God and Jesus Christ, appeals for the free circulation of obscene matter, demands that Denis Kearney, should be released, howling and yelling. The audience was made up of Freethinkers, Freelovers, Infidels, and radical Spiritualists, and free rein was given to the motley crowd. The resolutions adopted were characterized by indecent and blasphemous sentiments. It would hav been in the interest of common decency if the whole crowd could hav been landed at one sweep into the penitentiary."

Here are several glaring and positive falsehoods, and the animus of the whole thing is expressed in the closing remarks, that everybody who attended the meeting, and all who show any oppositions to theological tyranny should be sent to prison. This is the Christian sentiment of to-day, the same spirit of persecution which has animated the church for over fifteen hundred years. This spirit we hav to meet, and we must not shut our eyes to the fact. The truth about that Reception meeting is just this: there never was a more respectable, well behaved, intelligent audience gathered together in this or any other city. None of the rough element, none of the disorderly class were there. The conduct of the audience was correct in every respect. They were earnest and enthusiastic at times, but there was no "howling," no "yelling," no "obscenity," nor "blasphemy," no demands in reference to Kearney, no demands that obscenity should freely circulate, no denouncing of religion. The speeches made were excellent, the music was of the first quality, and every assertion to the contrary is grossly false. The charges of "obscenity" and "indecency," perhaps, were based upon a few words spoken by Mr. Heywood. In showing the effects of Comstock legislation he stated the fact that by the recently enacted laws of Massachusetts, it was a crime, punishable with imprisonment, for a syringe to be kept in a family, and in connection he repeated the remark he heard a good lady of Boston make—"O, that Comstock's mother had had a syringe." He also made use of the scripture expression, "plowed with the heifer." This is all of the "obscenity" which the Christians are so shocked at and make such an outcry in reference to. This was the entire offending. As to "blasphemy" that is a standing charge against unbelievers. They can say nothing but what is denominated "blasphemy." If they expose any of the many errors and falsehoods of the Christian system, the cry of "blasphemy" is at once raised, and the penitentiary quickly suggested—the same persecuting spirit which has reddened the earth with blood and thrust desolation and death into millions of families.

The Inter Ocean, of Chicago, in the account it gave, got the thing badly mixed, confounding D. M. Bennett with Covert D. Bennett, and making other equally egregious blunders. But it succeeded in showing its animosity, untruthfulness and unfairness.

The following somewhat mild account of the Chickering Hall meeting appeared in the Christian Advocate, of this city:

PUBLIC DECENCY OUTRAGED.—The name of D. M. Bennett became notorious some months ago because of his conviction for sending obscene matter throngh the mails. He was last week released from the Albany Penitentiary, his term of imprisonment having expired, and on Sunday evening, May 2d, his friends assembled in Chickering Hall, New York city, to welcome him as a martyr and to denounce the religious conscience and the public sense of decency which has secured his punishment. A letter was read from Charles Bradlaugh. The meeting was addresssd by "Liberal" speakers, who warmly indorsed Mr. Bennett's course, and deprecated all efforts to check the dissemination of obscenity by means of the post-office.

The following more untruthful account is from the Evangelist, of this city:

D. M. Bennett, who was sent to the penitentiary for circulating obscene printed matter through the mails, advertised for a week to make a public exhibition of himself in prison garb. Indeed he had a reception, and speeches were made over and about him as though he had suffered martyrdom for truth's sake. Mr. Bennett published a number of books in which (as we are told) the vulgarity is as offensive to good taste as their bald Infidelity is repugnant to reason and good morals. And his Infidelity is of the gross materialistic sort which would destroy Christianity and all religion, and leave nothing but animalism in their place. It is not strange that in a great community like ours men like Bennett and Ingersoll and Heywood appear from time to time any more than that men appear with color blindness, or total insensibility to music, or incapacity for mathematics. It is strange, however, and to be regretted, that men who flaunt their shameless denials of the great truths of religion boldly in the face of the community should be encouraged and supported by people who do not sympathize with their Atheistic views, and ought to be disgusted with their coarseness and profanity.

The positive falsehoods in this notice are apparent. Bennett has published no vulgar books, though the above religious editor "was told" that such was the case. Neither is the Infideliiy of his books "repugnant to reason and good morals." Reason and good morals are carefully cherished and respected. His Infidelity may be of "the materialistic sort," but it is not "gross," unless the universe, the truth, and even God himself, may be called "gross." If Christianity is sought to be destroyed, if its myths and fables are exposed, it is not to "leave nothing, but animalism in their place," but rather to giv people the greater prize of truth and nature's laws. The canting remark about the "men who flaunt their shameless denials of the great truths of religion boldly in the face of the community," is simply a part of ecclesiastical twaddle. What are called the "great truths of religion" which this pious editor is so fearful may be disturbed? They are:

1. Because an ignorant man and woman whom God created a little less than six thousand years ago eat an apple or two of God's which he placed within their reach thousands of millions of their descendants must burn in hell forever.

2. God created a rival able to circumvent and destroy all the well-matured plans he had devised from all eternity, and in consequence he had to come down from his throne in heaven and be put to an ignominious death in order to render it possible that one per cent of his own children might be saved from this dreadful rival.

3. Three are one and one is three. The son is as old as the father, and after the son was begotten and born the family was by no means increased in numbers.

4. A merciful God is so full of loving kindness that he provided a burning hell of intense heat in which countless trillions of his offspring are to suffer to the latest moments of eternity while himself, his son, and a few favored ones are to enjoy a blissful forever in the consciousness that the vast numbers of their friends, relatives, and fellow-beings are to burn in unutterable agony forever.

5. In order for God to make known his will and desires to the people of the earth in Christendom it is necessary to keep some five hundred thousand salaried men called priests, who liv on the fat of the land without labor, and who for their occasional prayers and homilies are believed to be entitled to a life of ease and freedom from toil, the masses deeming it a privilege to work for them and feed them with luxuries and clothe them in broadcloth and fine linen.

These are a few of the many religious truths which the clergy and the religious press do not wish to hav disturbed, and for which Bennett is a monstrous blasphemer for calling attention to and exposing the absurdity of. For this he was sent to prison. His Infidel publications were the offense. And for this they would like to see every person who favors his views also cast into the penitentiary.

The Syracuse Evening Herald, a panderer to religious prejudices, has this lying notice of the Chickering Hall meeting:

The reception tendered to D. M. Bennett, the discharged convict, in New York city, last evening, would hav been all right in its way if it had been distinctly understood as a private affair. The effrontery of giving it a public character, however, is to be matched only by the impudence of the beneficiary in accepting such a testimonial. Bennett, proved by his own handwriting to be a dirty hound, set himself up as a martyr, and Elizur Wright, Stephen Pearl Andrews, and the rest of the crew who are laboring to bring disgrace upon Liberal thought, bowed down and worshiped at his shrine. As compared with the poor painted wretches who thronged the streets outside of the reception hall, plying the lowest of vocations, the women who sat on the platform within made but a feeble showing of respectability; for the drabs at least deserve credit for being ashamed of their trade and prosecuting it under cover of darkness, while the so-called "female agitators" make a boast of theirs.

More meanness and falsehood could hardly be crowded into a space of the same magnitude. It is simply the lowest and foulest slander. There were no "painted wretches" thronging the streets outside. The hall is located in the most orderly and respectable part of the city, and is many squares from the haunts of vice and painted wretches, none of whom were attracted to the hall.

The ungentlemanly fling at the ladies on the platform is such a foul aspersion as none but a blackguard would be guilty of. There are no better women in this land than Mrs. Amy Post, Mrs. Amelia H. Colby, Mrs. Olive K. Smith, Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, and the scores of other most excellent ladies who occupied the platform. This slander is eminently worthy of a Christian defamer. The assertion that "Elizur Wright and Stephen Pearl Audrews, and the rest of the crew, are labering to bring disgrace upon Liberal thought" is simply contemptible and vile, containing not a word of truth. This is only another exemplification of the depths of falsehood and unfairness to which Christian zealots are forced to support their rapidly decaying system.

The report of the New York Times, a semi-religious panderer, was mainly fair, admitting that "there was not an inch to spare, either sitting room or standing room," but it was unfair enough to say: "The speakers exhausted the deepest corners of the unabridged dictionary in throwing epithets at the Creator, the ministers, the Christian religion, and the Republican party. In fact Chickering Hall made, perhaps, its first acquaintance with the indecent matter that is not sent through the mails, but comes out of men's mouths. Bennett, the hero of the evening, bore his honors modestly, and was comparatively moderate in his remarks, going no farther than to boast of his Infidelity; but Heywood, the author of the pamphlet called "Cupid's Yokes," said that he was lately out of Dedham Jail, and proved his title to a full convict suit by making as dirty a speech as ever a filthy-minded man was allowed to do before an audience of New York women." This is extremely unfair—such misrepresentation as Christians hav often shown themselves capable of.

The Cleveland Leader, as quoted by W. S. Bell, says: "The above individual, Bennett, is a pet of Bob Ingersoll, who took part in a Freelove, Freethinking Liberal meeting a Cincinnati last year for the purpose of ventilating their indignation at the imprisonment of Bennett." This is full of the meanest kind of falsehoods. But perhaps nothing better is to be expected from the apologists and defenders of Christianity, a system made up of the errors, fables, and absurdities of paganism and the barbarism of thousands of years ago. It is not in the nature of things for falsehoods to engender a love of truth, and the efforts of the pious defamers will prove utterly unavailing.

As to the Chickering Hall meeting the public need not be mistaken. The speeches were reported verbatim by Mr. Henry H. Sherman, one of the best stenographers in the city, and the report was faithfully printed from his copy, the two trivial passages from Heywood's remarks, to which some objected, being omitted. See the report of the "Bennett Reception," printed in pamphlet form, and notice how our enemies hav falsified us.

Sad and Pitiful.

The great apostle of cultured Freethought, the great pretender to superfine morality and double-distilled Liberalism, the main claimant of all that is decent, pure, and refined in Rationalism, in announcing his early withdrawal from the editorship of the Index, makes a most mournful wail over the state of things which makes his retirement necessary; and among nearly three columns of a similar character, headed, "Aproaching Separation," appears the following paragraph:

There is no grievance, or quarrel, or want of cordial understanding, carefully concealed from public view, in my going. The Directors of the Index Association are all tried, faithful, and generous friends of mine, who hav unstintedly helped me to carry on the work, some of them at great and wholly unremunerated sacrifice of precious time; and they reluctantly acquiesced when I told them the time to go had at last come of necessity. I do not abandon my post of my own free will; I would hav sooner dropped dead in my tracks; I go only because I must. Yet I am glad to be honorably released. Wearied in head and heart, most of all by the mortifying apathy and indifference to the highest interests of their own cause shown by thousands of intelligent Liberals, who ought to have bravely flocked to my side these past two years to uphold the standard of liberty and morality combined, one and inseparable, I cannot but experience a sense of relief in now turning from all "movements," and devoting myself, so far as leisure permits, to purely intellectual labors in the common cause. When Liberal "movements" shall be clear-sighted enough and bold enough to take up the now neglected duties of the cause they profess to promote, clean their foully tarnished scutcheons, and plant themselves on ground that enlightened friends of mankind can thoroughly respect, I trust I shall then be able to rejoin them; but I stoop not to follow the libertinism, greed, and fraud that are now guiding organized Liberalism to perdition, nor yet to acquiesce in any mistaken ignoring of mischiefs so obvious and fatal. These mischiefs must be unitedly, publicly, and relentlessly confronted and fought down in Liberalism itself, or there is no future for any organized Liberal movement at all. The public conscience will yet grind them to powder: but woe to liberalism if it takes no part in that righteous and terrible grist! What I could do in this cause I have done, utterly indifferent to the fact that I thereby made myself a target for calumnies and curses innumerable; and it speaks ill of Liberalism that there hav been so few to go and do likewise. Nevertheless, necessary and inexorable as my duty has been in this direction, I find myself very willing to be relieved of a duty so little to my taste, and very willing to retire now to private life.

All right-minded Liberals must necessarily be filled with regret, as they often hav been within the past three years, that a man of the Index editor's caliber and ability should thus utterly wreck himself and destroy his usefulness. He started out promisingly in the conduct of the paper, and under such auspices as no other Liberal editor ever enjoyed in this country. The Index Association was established with a capital of $100,000, more than half of which has been paid in and lost. A very generous list of subscribers at one time patronized the paper. But, unfortunately, the editor early exhibited a fondness for quarreling and misrepresentation. He had a long and bitter quarrel with the man who did more than any other one in getting up the Index Association, selling Index stock, and obtaining Index subscribers. This quarrel had a most disastrous effect, and lost many friends and patrons to the Index.

When the unpretending and uncultured TRUTH SEEKER, without capital and without a stock company, came upon the stage, it received no friendly hand from the Index man, but rather coldness, jealousy, and enmity. THE TRUTH SEEKER sought to maintain friendly relations with its cultured senior, and spoke in none other than complimentary terms; but when its editor was arrested at the instigation of Christian persecutors, the Index rejoiced and made unkind and untruthful remarks, and tried to its utmost to throw discredit and suspicion upon its younger brother. When THE TRUTH SEEKER united with seventy thousand honest and intelligent people to prevail upon Congress to repeal an unjust and an unconstitutional law, the Index violently opposed the movement and savagely tried to cover THE TRUTH SEEKER and its friends with obloquy. In this course it struck a death-blow to itself, and also gave a damsging wound to American Liberalism. The issue thus raised was forced by the Index man into the deliberations of the Congress of the National Liberal League at Syracuse, in October, 1878, which resulted in his defeat in his effort to be re-elected President. His continued malice and misrepresentation of course alienated the better part of his readers; and it is not strange that the stockholders of the Index, who hav been repeatedly bled, should at length decide that some other course and some other manager are necessary.

It was very far from a fraternal and honorable course for the Index editor to do his utmost to throw opprobrium and disgrace upon the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER (even though he had thoughtlessly committed a very trivial mistake which caused injury to no person), and to send a most disreputable and unprincipled person to this city to act the spy and detective in prying into other peoples' affairs with a view to publishing the same, and persons, too, far better than himself. The publishing of that same disreputable person's falsehoods, slanders, gross exaggerations and distortions, sending thousands of extra copies to the friends of an imprisoned brother-editor, with the evident intent of doing him a deep and deadly injury, using for the purpose names obtained in a most culpable manner, was a black deed which a true gentleman would not commit, and must necessarily revert upon the head of the guilty party.

In the same issue in which appears "Approaching Separation," the Index editor makes another exhibition of his tergiversation and falsehood in attempting to account for his sending out thousands of his slanderous sheets to persons whose names were taken from a stolen list. He attempts to throw dust in the eyes of his readers by quoting a letter from S. H. Preston, which, however, has no possible connection with the matter at issue. Preston had THE TRUTH SEEKER list to use in mailing sample copies of the Physiologist by consent, but not for selling the names. Mr. Abbot doubtless received other letters, which had he saw fit to giv would throw far more light upon his dishonorable conduct. We proved more than two years ago that a mail list was stolen from our office. It was done in the night, after the hour of twelve. Some $15 worth of postage stamps were taken at the same time. A rival publisher was at that time in the same building with us, and he attempted the base deed of pulling us down and rising upon our ruin. Large numbers of his paper were sent to our patrons, and, in many instances, containing the same errors in initials, spelling, street, and number that were found to exist in our list, and which mistakes could not possibly hav occurred only as the names were copied from it. This man engaged in the same effort to crush us that Mr. Abbot has so persistently pursued. The two men were in active sympathy, and when the one abandoned the field, it is but natural that he should bestow upon the other the names he had in his possession. On no other basis can it be accounted for how Mr. Abbot could mail his slanderous sheet to hundreds and thousands of the patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER—persons who had never seen the Index before. Mr. Abbot cannot remove the dark suspicion which hangs over him by pretending that he obtained the names from the "Friendly Correspondence" of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for in a great number of cases did he send his vile sheet to friends and patrons of ours whose names never did appear in our columns. Hundreds of instances of this kind can be proved if necessary. In this way is accounted for the reason why the Index containing the shameful bombshell to kill us was mailed in scores of neighborhoods to such Liberals as took THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to none others. Mr. Abbot will hav to resort to some other expedient to clear his skirts from the guilt which rests upon him.

As an offset to his base attempt to ruin us by sending to our patrons such damaging slanders as he thought would exterminate us, he alludes to the fact that six and a half years ago, before we moved THE TRUTH SEEKER to this city, we obtained some ten thousand names of Liberal persons throughout the United States. Undoubtedly among them were several who took the Index. They were not obtained as Index names. We obtained them from a person who came by them honorably, honestly, and legitimately. We made an honorable and proper use of them, and did not send to one of the names anything to injure Mr. Abbot or his paper in the slightest degree. That is the difference between us. The names stolen from us were not obtained in an honorable manner. They were not used in an honorable manner. Most damaging falsehoods, slanders, and exaggerations were sent out to deeply injure us. It matters not that Mr. Abbot says he never saw our list. Nobody supposed that he had our list, but that he had the names copied from that list is clearly proven, and he made use of them to kill us off, if possible.

He very prudently does not accept our offer, under a forfeiture of $1,000, to point out from fifty to one hundred falsehoods he published, and which grew out of the unfortunate position he took. There would be no trouble in pointing them out. He evidently is not anxious for us to become an index to that extent.

He may hav meant it for charity when he said that our last letter from prison indicated that we were suffering from "softening of the brain." Possibly our brain may be soft, and that he has contributed not a little to make it so. That he has caused our heart to ache intensely is most positive. If his brain does not soften, it is to be hoped his heart may, and that in the new avocation to which he is to devote his attention he will not seek to injure his fellow-men by the agencies of slander, vilification, and falsehood.

It is a pity that his course in journalism could not hav been marked with less quarrelsomeness, less vindictiveness, and less malice; and that, in the remarkable professions he makes of love of purity, virtue, and morality, he would not cultivate truthfulness, charity, and honor. We certainly wish him all the success his conduct merits.

There is little doubt but what Mr. Potter, the successor to Mr. Abbot, will conduct the Index with ability and will pursue an honorable course. It cannot be believed that he will stoop to malignancy, defamation, and slander. We say heartily and sincerely, Let the Index flourish.

Ingersoll at Booth's Theater.

It was our good fortune to listen to the address of Colonel Ingersoll at Booth's Theater on last Sunday evening. The large and splendid theater was packed to its fullest capacity, not a spare inch of room being scarcely found. Many were compelled to return home unable to gain admission. It is thought three thousand people must hav been present. The lecture was, "What Must We Do to be Saved?" being the Colonel's latest and best. It was filled with brilliant points and kept the audience in an almost constant roar of laughter.

He commenced by urging all to divest themselves of superstition; and to illustrate the effects of superstition on the mind related an anecdote about a Jew who went into a restaurant to get a dinner and that he thought he would break over the rules of his religion and take a little bacon. When he went out into the open air the sky had become overcast and the thunders and lightnings were playing vividly. In his simplicity he thought all this commotion was because he had committed the great offense of eating a piece of bacon, and he stood abashed in view of the commotion of the elements, until, completely frightened, he returned into the restaurant, and, bending over to the proprietor, he said, "Oh, mine Gott did you ever see before such a big fuss made over a little piece of bacon?"

He sketched the Mosaic account of creation, when God made everything out of nothing, which he preferred to do rather than see it go to waste. He showed the ridiculousness of the story in such a way as to create a great amount of mirth.

He examined Christ's Sermon on the Mount, and approved of the most of it, but found nothing about having faith, nothing about keeping Sunday, and nothing about going to church. He said the devil was the principal spoke in the wheel of the Christian system. "Why," said he, "if the devil should die to-night, orthodoxy in the morning would be a fatherless orphan." An attempt will not here be made to repeat much that he said, but in our next we will giv a sketch of his most interesting remarks. He spoke for two and a quarter hours, and large numbers would gladly hav listened to him an hour longer.

WE learn that from some culpability on the part of some person or persons connected with the postal department, large numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER for May 8th, containing the account of the Bennett reception, failed to reach our patrons. This we regret exceedingly, as the number was an interesting one. We are sorry we cannot re-send the missing number, for it is exhausted. The Bennett reception is printed in pamphlet form, and to those who failed to receive the paper due them we will send the pamphlet for five cents. Price to others ten cents.

PHOTOGRAPHS IN PRISON GARB.—Those who wish a photograph of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER as he appeared in his prison garb can now be accommodated. Card size 15 cents or two for 25 cents, or one in citizen's dress as before he went to prison, and one in prison costume for 25 cents. Imperial size, 30 cents each.

The Bennett Reception.

The last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER contains a full report of the Bennett Reception. The occasion was one which will go far to compensate Mr. Bennett for his unjust imprisonment at the hands of persecuting bigotry. Among many congratulatory letters and dispatches read were dispatches from the Detroit and Dowagiac Liberal Leagues. The following letter, addressed to H. L. Green, Esq., by his son, Chapin H. Green, who resides in New York, and who attended the reception, has been forwarded to us, and we gladly giv it place as giving a succinct description of the event:

NEW YORK, May 3d.

MY DEAR FATHER: The assembly of people which gathered at Chickering Hall last evening to welcome the return of D. M. Bennett was of a density such as is seldom witnessed on any occasion. Indeed the concourse could not hav been greater, for both the seating and standing capacity of the vast hall was tested to its utmost. Ere the hour of opening the meeting had arrived hundreds of disappointed people were leaving the building, unable to gain admission; and to see them pouring out it must hav seemed to one upon the outside as if the meeting was over instead of about to commence. It was opened by Hon. Elizur Wright, who delivered an address, which was followed by another from T. B. Wakeman, Esq. Both were heartily applauded throughout. In the course of his remarks Mr. Wakeman urged upon the people the principles and importance of the National Liberal League, which appeal was received with a glorious acclamation. His remarks were particularly pointed, and he gave the courts of justice—or injustice, as he called them—the clergy, and Comstockism some pretty severe cuts, all of which were applauded to the echo. But the fever heat, the climax, the acme of enthusiasm, was not reached until in appropriate remarks Mr. Wakeman introduced the hero of the occasion, Mr. Bennett. It was then that the floodgates of applause were opened to their widest extent, and for five minutes the house rang with a cordiality of such a whole-souled, sympathetic nature as could only spring from the depths of the heart.

It must indeed hav been, as he remarked when quiet was finally restored, the proudest moment of his life. And the manifestation was not only a proud one to him, but also to every liberal-minded person present, as being a most emphatic indication of the progress of Liberalism.

In the course of Mr. Bennett's remarks he alluded to Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., and at the mention of his name one might hav supposed the house had suddenly become the abode of snakes, so loud and universal was the hissing. Ah, but when he spoke of the founders of the American government—Franklin, Jefferson, Paine—the name of Paine had scarcely left his lips before the whole multitude sent forth a storm of applause that would hav brought Messrs. Calvin, Edwards, and Wesley out of their graves had not those antiquarians long since been eaten by the worms. It was a glorious occasion, and how much I wish you might hav been there. It would hav done your heart good. Hurrah for Liberalism, which is growing faster and faster all the time! Lovingly, CHAPE.

Buckeye Brevities.

MR. W. J. TAYLOR, Findlay, Ohio, writes: "We hav had W. S. Bell here for three nights, and organized a League on Sunday, May 2d, electing the following officers: President, Wm. McKinnis; Secretary, W. S. Hamaker; Treasurer, W. J. Taylor." Mr. Taylor and Mr. McKinnis hav worked hard to get up this League, and I hope that the Liberals of Findlay and thereabouts will promptly aid these gentlemen in the advancement of this new auxiliary.

MR. NEWTON VANCE, Vance's Landing, Ohio, writes: "Outspoken, earnest Liberals are very few in number in this vicinity, not numbering more than seven, all told. But the several questions pertaining to religion hav been much agitated within the last two years, and considerable tumult reigns among Christians here." Now will three more Liberals at Vance's Landing and Concord, Ky. (just opposite on the Ohio river), come forward and assist Mr. Vance in forming an auxiliary there?

MR. C. W. HARTZEL, North Benton, Mahoning Co., O., writes, "There are a number of dyed-in-the-wool Liberals in this city." Will they co-operate with Mr. Hartzel or Mr. Chester Bedell in establishing an auxiliary?

MR. SELDEN S. COOKE, Chillicothe, O., writes: "I expect I am the most outspoken Infidel in Ross county, being an Atheist and Materialist of the Charles Bradlaugh type, and not of kin to Spiritualism in any form. I belong neither to democracy nor republicanism, and hence am free. Will giv you any desired information, but my profession claims all my time." Now I should be pleased to hav the Liberals of Chillicothe and vicinity organize an auxiliary. There are enough Liberals in Chillicothe to establish and keep up a flourishing one, and I hav no doubt but Mr. Cooke would find just a little time to assist in the good work.

MR. J. B. DIETRICH, Crestline, O., writes, "There is good material here to work on, and all it wants is stirring up." Will our Liberal friends up there see to it with Mr. Dietrich, that the necessary shaking up is proceeded with, and at once? There ought to be a first class League at Crestline before the next annual Congress.

MR. R. A. HASBROUCK, Ravenna, O., writes, "The members of the Portage County Liberal Society are in favor of declaring themselves an auxiliary Liberal League." Mr. Hasbrouck has been largely instrumental in persuading the society to this resolution, and great credit is due him for his efforts in that direction. I hope the Liberals of Ravenna, Kent, etc., will assist him or Mr. Heighton in building up a good strong League.

DR. CHARLES E. BEARDSLEY, Ottawa, Ohio, writes: "I presume I am located in one of the most ignorant, therefore one of the most superstitious and intolerant, communities outside of New Mexico, on the continent of America. I am at work, if you do not hear the sound of my bugle. I am undermining their strong forts, and hope at some day, not far in the future, to spring the mine, demolish their works of superstition, capture their god, and bottle him." Dr. Beardsley has a hard row to hoe in his part of the vineyard, but I trust soon to hear the sound of cymbal and timbrel announcing the successful canning of the Ottawa god.

MR. W. S. WOOD, Shawano, Wis., writes, "Formerly a resident of Ohio, I send you the names of some Coshocton Liberals." I am much obliged to Mr. Wood, and now will those Liberals of Coshocton come forward and let me hear from them direct?

COL. R. G. INGERSOLL lectured last Sunday night at Pike's Opera House to an immense audience on, "What Shall We Do to be Saved?" The Colonel's presence was quite a relief, when it was considered that five hundred Methodist preachers are at present infecting the city and bulling the poultry market.

I SHALL be very glad to answer all letters addressed to me, but I must request my Liberal correspondents to come to my aid pecuniarily. Since last September I hav borne the not trifling expense of stationery, printing, and postage on letters and circulars myself. It is not just that I should continue to do so. Where I giv my time and best endeavors to further the cause of the Liberal League in this state, the Liberals of Ohio can, I think, afford to send me a few postage stamps occasionally. They will come handy and will be applied to good purposes.

300 Foxes With Firebrands Tied to Their Tails.

BY BROTHER SMITH.

My Beloved Brothers and Sisters: Your spected preacher am again called to splain God's holy word, and it givs me ticular pleasure to see the St. Johns school board present, for I'se selected the toughest text in the good book for to talk about, an' the reason that I say it's the toughest story to believers is because I'se had some sperience in trying to catch foxes myself. My text may be found in Judges xv, 4. It says, "And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes, and took firebrands, an' turned tail to tail, an' put a firebrand in the midst between their tails." Reason would teach that no one man could catch three hundred foxes. I once tried six weeks to catch a fox, and I didn't get him nuther. So you see with my sperience this sacred fox story came mighty near shaking my faith in the whole book. If you tie two dogs together by their tails they wouldn't run a rod. They would each one conclude that the other was holding him back, so instead of running they would pitch in an' fight, an' foxes would do the same as dogs.

But luckily, my beloved, the whole thing was splained to me the other night in a dream. An' a voice said unto me that them foxes was inspired foxes. They all come out of the woods, and when Samson got a firebrand ready two foxes would turn round and meekly back up, and when a brand of fire was tied to their tails they just put in an' drawed like a pair of three-year old steers. Glory to God! My beloved, every fox did his level best in drawing firebrands in among the corn of the Philistines.

An' as an evidence of the truth of this story, there is even unto this day a few of their descendants which am well known among the fur buyers as the Samson fox, on account of their tails having the appearance of being singed. It wouldn't do for one fox to run on one side of a little tree, an' the other fox to run on the other side, 'cause if they did all of the foxes would get hung by the tails, an' no corn would get burned. So you see they was inspired, and things all worked to a charm. If Samson catched all of them foxes in a box trap, he was a mighty good trapper.

Samson was awful stout. He killed one thousand men with the jawbone of a mule. He was so stout that he could take a mule by the tail and sling him into a crowd as easy as a boy could sling a stone. He was awful stout in his hair, but a little weak in his head. A good-looking woman could take him by the nose and lead him in any direction. My beloved sisters, 'twas a woman that led Samson to his ruin. She made him tell her that his strength lay in his hair, and she then gave him one of them sort o' meltin' expressions with her eyes, and sweetly asked him to lay his head in her lap and go to sleep, an' he, like an old fool, did so, an' she took a pair of shears an' cut off the hair of his head, when he became weak as any other man. An' now, my brethren, let me warn you agin laying your head in a woman's lap, an' 'specially if she's not your wife. For this woman cried unto the Philistines, an' they went for Samson pretty ruff, I can tell you. But once more we return to our blessed text.

"An' Samson caught three hundred foxes an' tied firebrands to their tails." This am a very important lesson, calculated to teach the children in our public school how to burn their neighbor's corn, and the St. Johns school board do well in charging the district for imparting to the boys, through the professors, the science of burning corn.

It is true that boys, and so could Samson, hav taken a brand of fire in his own hand, and burned more corn, an' a thousand times easier, than by the fox process, but God preferred to try the fox-tail experiment, and it worked well. Glory to God! It showed how God could inspire foxes to back up and cross their tails for a brand of fire.

Bro. Jones will pass the hat for Christ's sake. Such as hav no change can send the spected preacher a yellow-legged chicken, spring chickens preferred.

The Bennett Reception.

MR. EDITOR: With your permission I will say to your readers what I wanted to say in Chickering Hall, New York, at Mr. D. M. Bennett's reception on Sunday evening, May 2d, but could not for lack of time. It was in substance as follows:

I wanted in the first place to thank the ladies and gentlemen present, for attending in such large numbers, and completely filling Chickering Hall on this important and memorable occasion, and for the testimony they gave that they were in sympathy with the object of the meeting, as manifested by their continuous and enthusiastic applause. I felt satisfied that the audience were in hearty sympathy with Mr. Bennett, a fact that filled his friends with courage and enthusiasm, and, I hope, his enemies with remorse and repentance for the evil they hav done him.

I wanted also to say to that large meeting what I believe to be a truth, which is, that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the Liberals of the country honestly and intelligently belive that D. M. Bennett had just as good a right to send "Cupid's Yokes" through the mails as Anthony Comstock had to send the Bible by that conveyance, and if we punish men for mailing "Cupid's Yokes," we certainly ought to punish them for mailing the Bible. If one is obscene, the other is worse—that is, if "Cupid's Yokes" is obscene, the Bible is more so.

Ever since Mr. Bennett was sent to prison for exercising his natural right to the mails, I hav felt like damning orthodoxy to its own infernal and never-ending hell. When it was announced that Mr. Bennett was to receive a public reception, I felt that I could not do less than attend. I wanted to help fill the hall, for if Mr. Bennett was brave enough to go to prison in defense of free speech, I certainly ought to be willing to go to his reception and help to make it a success. I also wanted to see and shake hands with our brave hero and martyr.

Allow me to say that I feel like indorsing a fearless sentiment which Mr. Bennett gave at the crowded meeting. He said that it was the proudest moment of his life to stand before that vast assembly of Liberals under the circumstances that had brought them together, and he added that it almost paid him for all the sufferings and privations he had endured. I must say that I feel like repeating that sentiment, that it was to me the happiest moment of my life, standing as I was in that great and grand meeting, helping to honor Mr. Bennett by speech, song, and cheers to our hearts' content.

Permit me also to state that among all the great and grand speeches of the evening, none satisfied the hearts of the audience like the words of Mr. Bennett, when he modestly but boldly declared that if the cause of freedom required another sacrifice like that he had passed through, he was ready, if need be, to go to prison again.

I see that Mr. Francis E Abbot is sneering at us again in his Index. He speaks of Mr. Bennett's reception and his friends as the friends of a "go-as-you-please morality," forgetting that he has been teaching for years that men should obey only natural morality, which is simply obedience to reason and conscience; or, in other words, going as your nature directs—another form of going as you please.

If I hav got to choose between going as I please, and going as somebody else pleases to hav me, I shall not hesitate long in choosing my company. We hav intellectually aristocratic, self-righteous bigots on one side, and broad, democratic, go-as-you-please Liberals on the other. How shall I choose? To go as I please, or to go as Mr. Abbot pleases?

> When doctrines meet with general approbation.
> It is not heresy, but reformation.

And so it is with Liberal Leagues. We hav now about two hundred Leagues, because they can go as they please, and presume to take that liberty without consulting Mr. Dictator Abbot, the self-glorified author of the "consensus of the competent."

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, let me say that the reception and reading of dispatches was a very novel but interesting ceremony, which reminded me of election day. There was great cheering on hearing the dispatches read. I was proud to hear words of congratulation and sympathy from Horace Seaver and Paine Hall Liberal League, also from Frank Rivers and Shawmut Liberal League. The reception was a grand success in every way.

Yours respectfully, J. S. VERITY.

A Friendly Challenge to Spiritualists Everywhere.

BY W. F. JAMIESON.

It is now a year and a half since I publicly and privately avowed my acceptance of scientific "Materialism." With charity for all and malice toward none did I take my position in obedience to my conviction. It was no wish of mine to make war upon my old associates in Spiritualistic belief. They, however, were not so considerate, some of them. Challenges to debate were offered me by leading Spiritualists, which, in every instance, I accepted. Let those Spiritualists of Michigan who are reporting that I refuse to meet Spiritualists in debate make a note of this. When I refuse to debate a proposition which I hold to be true affirmatively or negatively, I will abandon the proposition.

Many times I hav been charged by unfriendly Spiritualists with a refusal to compare my views with those of my "god-son" Moses Hull. When he was at Hobert, Ind., he sent me word that if arrangements could be made he would debate with me. I finally succeeded in making an engagement for Linesville Station, Pa., but Moses' lecture appointments prevented the anticipated discussion. He could not, he said, at that time meet me.

Knowing, as I do, that Spiritualists profess to be eager for debate, I do not accuse them of declining to defend and maintain their fundamental doctrine, that there is absolute proof that spirits of departed human beings communicate with people on earth.

What was evidence to my mind at twenty years of age proved to be no evidence at forty. I now do not think that the "wonders" of Spiritualism all put together demonstrate the existence of any spirit or mind after the death of its body. I do not say that there is no spiritual world, but I do say that the probability is that when a man dies he is as dead as a dog; and a dog, when it dies, is as dead as a door nail—as far as I know, i. e., I do not know that the canine will not liv always. When he stops breathing and the man stops breathing, the probability is just as good for one as the other, from all appearance, not to liv. Admitted, as science teaches, that appearances are deceptive, I wish that Spiritualists could demonstrate their thesis. I offer them an opportunity to bring forward the demonstration. Let those who are so very anxious to hav a debate between Moses Hull and myself make the necessary arrangements.

Will they do so? Will they co-operate with the Materialists of their neighborhoods? Debates cannot run themselves any more than lectures on Spiritualism, Materialism, or science. Will they do as much pecuniarily for debate as for one sided advocacy of Spiritualism? If not they are not as anxious for debate as they seem to be, nor as liberal in sustaining it as Christians are.

To those Spiritualists who hav asserted that I would rather debate with Campbellites, Methodists, etc., than Spiritualists I reply that the assertion is utterly groundless. I hav no personal ill will toward Spiritualists. I number among them some of my best friends, who hav no inclination to censure any one for maintaining his own views.

So let it be understood, once for all, that I will meet them in friendly debate as cheerfully as I encounter Christians. We should all hate quarreling, but ever be willing to discuss the vital issues of our time. We should also, it seems to me, accord to others strict honesty of purpose and opinion in absence of positive proof to the contrary. This, sorry to say, some Spiritualists are not disposed to do. They imagine that no one can honestly change his opinion from Spiritualism to Materialism. They forget that the church, to which many of them once belonged, impugned their own motives in their espousal of Spiritualism in the same manner.

The work that Spiritualists are doing for this world Materialists are in accord with. I grant, however, that this fact should not close the gate of free discussion on the points of difference between them.

Already hav I had the pleasure of a few tilts with such able Spiritualists as O. P. Kellogg, Mr. Talmadge, Mrs. Libbie Watson, W. M. Lockwood, J. O. Barrett, Gen. Roberts. There are Lyman C. Howe, J. M. Peebles, Giles B. Stebbins, R. C. Flower, T. H. Stewart, S. B Britain, A. E. Newton, Cora Richmond, S. B. McCracken, J. H. W. Toohey, Bishop Beals, Nellie Brigham, Amelia Colby, Mrs. Sheppard, and many other pugilistic Spiritualists, who are ready to meet their Christian opponents in debate. Why should they shrink from joint discussion with Mr. Underwood, Mr. Phelps, Mr. Holmes, Mr. Bell, or myself?

Of course I am not authorized to speak for the other Materialists, but if Spiritualists suppose their evidence will stand the test of investigation, and that they hav the facts to overthrow Materialism, it is downright cruelty to keep those facts in private and public circles away from a waiting world. Let the mediums be brought forward—those who are constantly employed to giv public tests—and I will endeavor to furnish scientific "mediums" to sustain modern Materialism. Are you ready? My address is Lake City, Minn.

The Backwoods Pulpit.

REV. F. OCTAVUS BENSON ACCEPTS A CALL AND PREACHES HIS FIRST SERMON AT THE YAM HILL FIRST METHODIST CHURCH, LEFT WING.

Belubbed Brudderz an' Sisterz: In acceptin' ob de call to fill de pulpit ob de Yam Hill Fust Mefodiz church, left wing, I was influenced darto by two powerful reasenz. Fust, dat de wages was higher dan I was a reseabin' at de church at Buzzard's Roost; an', secondly, I was mo' suah of my pay. When I reseab de notify from Deacon Nicodemus Jonsing dat you wanted a fust-class shepherd, I axed: Am dat flock healthy? Hab dey all dey fleeces on, or did udder shepherds done take all de fleeces off? Does dey pay up ebery Saturday night? Does dey use gold and silber to oil de trail ob deir pastor an' make slick his way froo dis vale of tearz? Does dey take up spontaneous collectionz twice ebery Sunday, an' ebery lam' come up wid a fifty-cent'ante fur de benefit ob de poor—de poor pastor? An' our dearly belubbed deacon responded to all dese catagoriez by sayin' yes, in de affirmitavely. Den your newfound shepherd axed him, morely: Do dey gib a cord ob knotty, twisty, green wood, when good dry is sellin' at five dollarz, and ring dis in on deir pastor as a ten-dollar contribushun? Do dey gib a donashun pawty an' spoil de shepherd's carpets, an' his furniture, an' borrowed tablecloths, an' udder borrowed articles, an' say, "How tankful he ought to be fur to hav sich a generouz flock?" Do all you ole wimmin, an' young ones, too, come laden wid from a peck to a half bushel of fried doughnutz, an' eat up all de pastor's good fixinz, an' say, "Dah, now, de ole man'z got enuf eatinz to last him six months?" Do you ole wimmin folks club togedder and make him a big thin dressin'-gown, wid big sunflowerz all over it, an' den go cacklin' roun' how dey presented deir dear ole pastor wid a sufficiency ob wardrobe to last him clean froo de winter? An' Deacon Jonsing arised in great wrath an' answered, no, in de negatively, by sayin', "Not by a dam site. You 'spose we's like dem ole orthodox heathen Christianz? On behalf ob de Yam Hill church, I scawn de base imputashun."

Belubbed bredderin, den it wez I went down on my knees and rassled in prayer all de way from five to ten seconds, an' I rised up, refreshed, and wrote you dat I hear de spirit say: "Brudder Flavius Octavus Benson, go thou up to the charge at Yam Hill. You can't do better if you loaf roun' here a whole month of Chrismussez." An' I came. An' I will remain until de spirit hunts up annuder call whar dar is a larger flock wid bigger fleeces.

I didn't tackle on no tex' to dis sarmint for de reazon dat it am a little openin' talk—jess a little confab 'tween ourselvez, in which I done tole you de programme your pastor's gwine to chalk out for his future ministry. But den dis tex' business is only used for a ornament outside ob de left wing churchez. De udder preacherz roll up deir eyes wen dey roll out deir tex', and den all de way clean froo de sarmint dey fight shy ob it an' circle all roun' as if it was a knowin' ole polecat, an' dey's afeard ob tacklin' it. Dey jess use a tex', and, wen you'z tryin' to get de sense ob de tex' froo your wool, dey commence frowin' sand in your eyes, an' you'z got nothin' else to do but look roun' at de gals or go to sleep in order to git your brainz back to deir normal condition. But I'se gwine to hitch a tex' on to ebery sarmint henceforwardly an' stick as close to it as a thousand-dollar mortgage on a fifty-dollar shanty. Your pastor will use de same privilege enjoyed by de gemmen ob de long-tailed black coats an' white chokerz by takin' his tex' anywhere he can cotch it in the Bible. But, unlike dem, he will not read you one ting an' say it meanz annuder. De langwidge must speak for itself, and your pastor will prove it to be true by udder texts, and den confiscate some udder varses to prove dem all to be a wicked lie. So long as you can come up wid liberal antes to de contribushun sasser, you can take your choice.

Your pastor will also treat at diverz times ob de great libin apostlez, de holy detective, Tony, de soap-grease Christian, an udder followerz of Jesuz, followin' so far behind dat wen de gates ob heaven am shut dey'll find dey haint near got half through hell, and dar dey'll roost foreber an' ebermore, or hell aint south from de new Jerusalem, or aint at all. But if dar is a hell, jess a little one, big enough for six, den you may be shuah dat de seats am all reserved for Tony and his gang. But I digress.

Your pastor will also speak ob de great and good men mentioned in de Bible. He will show de lives dey led, and hold it up for your gaze, so dat you an' your chillun'z children can dodge de way dat leads to de prison an' de scaffold; to de drunkard'z and de murderer'z grave. He will show you dat dar's more morality in de prisonz ob de world now dan eber lodged in the buzzumz of God'z anointed. He will speak ob de good tings roun' uz, an' wen he tacklez de ebil he will gib you de exact chapter an' verse.

De jaunt from Buzzard's Roost to dis heah lubly Yam Hill haz kind ob fatigued your shepherd, so we will close de servicez by askin' de deacon to pass roun' de contribushun sasser while de choir will sing:

De Lord lubz a cheerful gibber,
Early in de mawning.
Don't put in a penny sliber,
Early in the mawning.
Loud your praises you must holler,
Early in de mawning.
Backed up by a big bright dollar,
Early in de mawning.
Den foreber an' ebermore,
Early in de mawning.
You will play on de golden shore,
Early in de mawning.

Letter from W. S. Bell.

My Dear Bennett: Yesterday I had the pleasure of reading the report of your reception in Chickering Hall. It was a grand affair, and will be read by many thousands of Liberals with great satisfaction and pleasure. The saints are gnashing their teeth over this uprising of free speech in your defense. To show to what desperation orthodoxy is driven in the matter of your reception I giv a few sentences from the Chicago Tribune: "The proceedings were characterized by blasphemy and obscenity throughout, denunciations of religion and the clergy, blasphemous allusions to God and Jesus Christ, appeals for the free circulation of obscene matter, demands that Denis Kearney should be released, and howling and yelling. The audience was made up of Freethinkers, Freelovers, Infidels, and radical Spiritualists, and free rein was given to the motley crowd. The resolutions adopted were characterized by indecent and blasphemous sentiments. It would hav been in the interests of common decency if the whole crowd could hav been landed at one sweep into the penitentiary."

It will be in the interest of free thought if no Liberal hereafter shall buy a single copy of the Chicago Tribune. Mark that paper.

The Cleveland Leader, a dirt-eating or dirt-slinging sheet, as exigencies demand, was not to be outdone by the immaculate conceptions which embellished the fair pages of the Chicago Tribune, and it copies the above extract and adds its own drivel after this fashion: "The above individual, Bennett, is a pet of Bob Ingersoll, who took part in a Free-love, Freethinking 'Liberal' meeting at Cincinnati last year for the purpose of ventilating their indignation at the imprisonment of Bennett. The foregoing description of the orgies illustrates most strikingly what we would all come to if Infidelity should reign supreme in our land. What is there to take the place of the benign spirit of true Christianity, which teaches everything that is good and nothing that is bad? Infidelity, as a rule, teaches nothing except denying the truth of revelation and hatred of Christianity."

In reading these eloquent and elegant extracts, descriptive of the reception, I more than ever regret I was not there. I should like to hav witnessed the "orgies," which means, I suppose, water turned into wine, and then the wine copiously turned into the "motley crowd." I should hav been interested, to say the least, in giving ear to the "howling and yelling," while others gave it tongue. In a political gathering similar demonstrations would be termed "loud applause." In Joe Cook's Monday morning tirades they would be written "as revised by the author," "enthusiastic cheers," and in the more devotional meetings of Moody they would be sanctified by the title, "shouts of glory." But I shall always regret my absence from the "orgies" of that memorable occasion. Then there was "blasphemy." "My prophetic soul, mine uncle." Here is the rock in the stream upon which the craft of Freethought is to be wrecked. If some judge of the United States Supreme Court can be found who will define blasphemy and send a few Liberals to prison for asking Jesus a few questions in an open letter, it will be the tocsin for every judge in the country wishing favor to arrest the blasphemer and see to it that he is sent to prison. Depend upon it, Christians are talking more and more about the vengeance of the Lord upon blasphemers, and they mean business. They fined a lecturer at Irwin Station for blasphemy and other irreligious acts.

But returning to the elegant extract from the immaculate Chicago sheet. I should not hav been quite so happy in those "orgies" if the whole crowd had been landed at one fell sweep into the penitentiary. How very amiable this Christian spirit makes the heart of its votaries. "It teaches everything that is good and nothing that is bad." Did you ever read anything equal to that? I am sure I never did. But all this bitterness, exaggeration, and falsehood are fruits of despair.

"These be thy gods, O Israel," is the first line of an abortive attempt at publishing a new batch of old letters attributed to D. M. Bennett. This six-page tract purports to be in the interests of decency and purity, but at the same time contains expressions probably as vulgar and obscene as any found in the holy Bible. These sheets are sent from Boston to Liberals in different parts of the country. No name or signature is attached to this would-be pious slander. Bundy and Abbot had the courage but indiscretion to subscribe their respective names to their obscenities, but the author of these scurrilous and obscene letters has no name to sign, yet many know who he is. His record is written and lies in Boston to-day. After living with his wife for a short time, and abusing her, he told her deliberately that he had married her simply to spite her father; afterward he shamefully deserted her. And this is the representative of respectability, virtue, and purity, sending filth through the mails in the name of "decency and the sanctity of the marriage vow." A man—if it be proper to call him a man—who marries for spite, abuses his wife, and cruelly deserts her, is truly a fit representative of decency and a most capable person for discoursing upon the "decency and the sanctity of the marriage vow." W. S. Bell.

Elmina versus Dodd.

On page 194, "Age of Reason," Paine says, "It is natural to believe that he [God] will . . call us to account for the manner in which we hav lived here." On page 195, "It is the fool only . . that would liv as if there were no God." How now about your Atheism? Are you one of Paine's "fools?" He classes Atheism in the opposite but as far from truth as fanaticism (page 196). Your Atheism is no new idea to Paine, but he denounces it.—J. H. Dodd.

Friend Dodd: I see from thy last letter thee thinks I meant to be personal in my application of such names as "canting," "psalm-singing," "hypocrite," etc., to the pious preachers and believers who are slandering our best and bravest men simply because they saw truths that are too profound for the average intellect of the day. But I intended the remarks to be general and not personal, though I did think thee was a little too hasty in exultingly parading on a postal card such charges as thee did against men whose names will shine in letters of gold long after thine and mine hav faded and paled away into oblivion.

It really does seem to me that you Christians are more desirous of picking flaws in Infidel characters than in their doctrines. We do not claim that our champions are perfect or infallible. They do not profess "sanctification," "purification," or "godliness." They only claim to be weak, erring mortals, who desire to rise higher and higher as the years roll on, and endeavor to do the very best they can to make themselves and their fellow-mortals wise, good, and happy here and now, instead of hugging to themselves the delusion that if they believe the Christian mythology now, and are baptized into Christ, and liv Christian lives, they will be allowed to enter the pearly gate, walk the golden streets, play upon harps, and see gods and angels in glory. Just take a glance at it, my friend, in its simple nakedness. Does it not look silly enough? Can even J. H. Dodd swallow it literally? Thee says thee has never bowed to any man, but I confess I hav. I feel it no loss of dignity or self-respect to bow or bend in acknowledgment to a superior genius or intelligence in the men and women around me, and in the minds of the heroes who hav gone from among us. I reverence the memory of Mr. Paine, and believe him to hav been a good and honest man, but not infallible or peerless. Though he was a Deist, and not an Atheist, matters not to me, so long as he gave frankly the truth that was in him, and spoke as he felt; and no one has denied that he was really what he seemed.

I am not at all hurt at being called one of "Paine's fools" for—believing as he did—he honestly thought no one who was not a fool would deny the existence of a God. I hav a broad charity for all true believers. I respect no man the less for his belief in myths and errors. But I protest against the bigotry, tyranny, and oppression that you Christians exercise over all but your own peculiar sects. I think it a base and iniquitous wrong in you to compel Infidels to pay taxes on millions of dollars' worth of church property, to support a vast and ever-increasing priesthood, to keep Sabbath laws, and to put them out of offices of profit and emolument. Few Infidels can conscienciously take the oath of office even if they are elected. I could not join the Masons, Good Templars, nor many other like societies if I wished, because I will not lie and say I believe in Almighty God, when I know it is impossible for any such incomprehensibility to exist; and they admit none but myth believers into fellowship with them—or those who say they believe.

There are even fanatics among Liberals, and illiberal men who think they are Liberal. But while we grieve that all men are not Liberal, charitable, and good, we claim that religion really creates hypocrisy, bigotry, and fanaticism in its believers; while in the ranks of Freethinkers these traits are the natural results of character and circumstances, and are none the stronger because of the Infidelity of their possessors. Had Paine lived till to-day he would hav been an Atheist himself, for he would hav found so much of the ground gone over that he could hav begun further on, and so reached a more distant goal in the race.

The quotations thee make do not to me prove any intentional dishonesty. We all put on our meanings to Bible talk, and each one understands it reading it in his own way. I think Infidel honesty is far more common than Christian honesty, simply because Infideis are free to go where truth leads them, while the Christian dares not think, act, or do only as Christ did, if he means to follow his guide. Our guide is reason, and we are bound only by the limits of our faculties and perceptions. We are tied to no effete, moldy past; we are free to go on, on, on, as far as mind can stretch; and ever as we go we see new truths and bright visions in the beyond still beckoning us higher up and further on.

"Truth is dawning, see the morning
Kindled over sea and land!
And the gilded hills are warning
That the day spring may not stand.

Far adown it flows and widens,
Souls are lighted by the blaze,
And the distant mountain summits
Stand transfigured with its rays."

Liberal League Notes.

The annual meeting of the Friends of Human Progress will be held at the usual place near Waterloo, N. Y., the 5th and 6th of June. I hope to meet many of the Liberal friends of central and western New York at this meeting.

The Board of Directors of the National Liberal League has succeeded in getting nearly all the vacancies on the Executive Committee filled by live, active Liberals, so that we now hav an admirable committee. Now let every Liberal friend everywhere understand that the committeeman who represents their state is the "head-center" of the movement in the state or territory, the one to hav the general supervision of the work; that he should in fact not only be that, and do that, but should be a "Liberal lecture bureau" in himself for his state. And our Liberal friends should not ask him to do all this work for nothing and pay his own expenses, but each Liberal of the state should contribute something for his support.

C. H. Dunning, the Liberal League representative for Michigan, has gone to work in earnest to make Michigan the banner state in the Liberal League movement. He writes: "As to our work here in Michigan, I hav secured the services of Mr. R. Wilson, of Auburn, Ind., to travel in this state and lecture and organize Leagues. He has no price for lectures; he only asks that his expenses be guaranteed, and whatever else the Liberal friends feel like donating him he will accept for his service. He is a noble man and sound to the core." I learn the great Liberal Convention is to be held in Michigan the 1st of July.

The Dallas, Tex., Liberal League is made up of Liberals of the true metal. The Christians of the town for some time past hav been giving an example of how they "love their enemies" by misrepresenting the Liberal League movement through the city press, and the Christian editors allowed the Liberals to reply only by paying for the insertion of their articles at the high advertising rates of twenty-five cents a line. So the Liberals in Dallas decided to hav an organ of their own, and hav just issued the first number of The Liberal League Advocate. I hope they may be sustained in their good work.

Since writing the above item I hav received a letter from T. C. Cornet, the Secretary of the Dallas League, in which he says: "Since the appearance of the first number of The Liberal League Advocate we hav succeeded in obtaining subscriptions sufficient to insure its publication monthly for one year and to double its size. We intend to make it the organ for the Liberals of Texas in particular. Next to lecturers a fearless and independent press is the most powerful ally to help us along in our struggle and manifold persecutions. There should be one paper, at least, published in each of the Southern states not afraid of Mrs. Grundy."

Bro. W. S. Bell appears to be doing valiant service in the lecture field, where he should be constantly kept at a living remuneration. He writes under date of May 5th: "I write you to say that after giving my first lecture in Finley, O., last Sunday, the Liberals of the place remained in the hall and organized an auxiliary Liberal League. There are but few Liberals here, but they are men of decided convictions and character. There are hosts of people in this town who will assent to Liberal ideas, but who will not even come out to hear the lectures. Mother Grundy is a power in this place."

The Liberals everywhere who were not permitted to attend the Bennett Reception looked eagerly for the New York papers of last Monday morning to see a report of the gathering, but before the papers came the Associated Press report gives the assurance that it was an immense gathering. Most of the New York papers attempted to belittle it and slur it over, but they were all compelled to report enough of the proceedings to show that it was a great success. In reading the proceedings I was pleased to see among the telegrams a congratulatory dispatch sent from one of the eight of the Abbot Leagues as published in the Index. It was from the "Onondaga County Liberal League." Will Abbot hereafter continue that League in full fellowship? The best report that I read was in Truth. This independent daily journal should be liberally patronized by the Liberal public. H. L. Green.

Salamanca, N. Y., May 9, 1880.

The Rev. Edgar L. Walker, of Pawlet, Vt., preached a sermon against Spiritualism. A correspondent of the Granville (N. Y.) Sentinel said it was one of Joe Cook the liar's old sermons, whereupon Walker got mad and threatened the editor, Mr. J. L. McArthur, with a libel suit. But Mac is a man whom the ministers don't scare worth a cent. Walker admitted that part of it was from Joe Cook. McArthur said through his paper, after calling the reverend gentleman an ass, that he could begin proceedings as soon as he wished. He publishes a sort of Liberal paper, respecting one man's opinion as well as another's.

Letters from Friends.

HAMILTON, R. I., April 27, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Let me congratulate you upon your liberation from Christian bondage, and say that the very fact of your imprisonment had the effect of making me an open Liberal. I consider the whole thing an outrage upon you, and I know, from my own experience in explaining the matter to those who hav any reason in their brain, that you hav given the church a bad blow. You couldn't deliver a more deadly one than you hav had you done your utmost. I want you to send me your new book.

With my best wishes for your prosperity and happiness, I remain, Your friend, JAS. N. ARNOLD.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, April 21, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find five dollars, which please use for increasing the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, or for your own private use, in any way which may seem best to you. I hope that each of your subscribers will aid you a little substantially in addition to their good wishes for your future success and prosperity and that of the Liberal cause, which you so ably represent.

I am glad that you will so soon receive the liberty which has so long unjustly been denied you. May you never lose the same again in fighting for it. Your friend,

CHAS. F. BLANDIN.

ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, ILL., April 28, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find six dollars. I hav taken your paper for the last three months, and must say it is the best paper for the money I ever took. One thing about it is that it tells more truth than any Christian paper ever did or ever will. My sympathy is with you, your paper, and your book on the "Gods," hoping you will be successful. For my part, I will do all I can to help you along, for I think we want just such papers as yours. We want such a man as Ingersoll to lecture to make this world nobler and happier.

One more remark. I suppose by the time this will reach you, you will be a free man—released from prison to enjoy freedom once more. How grand it is for us that Christians can't punish us forever on this earth! They will hav to wait until we get to the other world; and if truth is punished there, then we will hav to suffer; but if falsehood is punished, the Christians will be in for it. Truth will stand. If the church is ever so strong, it will hav to fall, because it has no truth in it. Yours truly,

HENRY F. BEHLENDOST.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 27, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I crave the honor of contributing my humble mite ($2) to help swell the chorus of rejoicing at the liberation of D. M. Bennett. Moral cowardice is the one great bane or vice of humanity. It is the negative, the antithesis, or the absence of virtue. Moral courage indicates faculties to perceive the truth through all blinding influences and the magnanimity to maintain it. The possessor of moral courage, which probably embraces all the greatest, noblest qualities of the human mind, is a true hero, and according to all commercial laws, the rarer a commodity the more valuable it is. D. M. Bennett is a "gem of purest ray serene," and has now fully demonstrated his right to sit beside Paine.

Yours, JAMES C. LEHMER.

SPRINGFIELD, Mo, April 27, 1880.

MY DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Your day of liberation draws near, when strong intellects and warm hearts will greet and welcome you to the glorious sunshine of liberty, where you will again be free to breathe the free air of heaven, not as a guilty offender of justice, but as one of earth's bravest, purest, and most talented philosophers and philanthropists. Many gallant hearts beat in unison and sympathy with you for the near approach of your advent from your gloomy prison abode, and will hail with pleasure the memorable meeting on the second of May in Chickering Hall to express the high esteem they and the world owe you, while many more want to, and would, meet with you there were it at all possible; and, although absent in person, will be present in thought and commune together with you, and, as far as possible, enjoy that grand reunion of soul so much desired. Nothing, I assure you, could afford me greater pleasure than to be present on that occasion, as I am fully satisfied it will be truly a feast of thought to all true hearts in sympathy with you and the great interest you express for the good of humanity.

While being shut out from the busy world in your gloomy cell, your mind has been none the less active, and the world will no doubt be greatly benefited by the productions of your masterly brain while there. This you need to, and must, be complimented for, in part, at least; and though I hav been unable to render you much assistance financially, be assured, dear brother, you hav all the while had my warmest sympathy, with my most earnest wish to help you more. Very truly and fraternally yours,

J. S. LYON, M.D.

LAWRENCE, MASS., May 2, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find two dollars for a new subscriber. As there is an effort being made to double the subscription list, I thought I would try and get what subscribers I could, if it was only for three months, as it might lead them to take it longer. I labor under some difficulties, for I am blind. I should hav been glad to hav rendered you some assistance, as others hav done, but I am unable to help myself. I hav been blind for ten years, and therefore my circumstances would not admit of my doing what I would otherwise hav done.

I was pleased to know you had so many kind friends that were able and willing to assist you in your troubles. I assure you I was rejoiced when the day came for you to come forth from those prison walls and breathe the pure air of heaven once more. I hav been much interested in the letters that you wrote while in prison. They were the first things I had read to me.

Col Ingersoll lectured here some time ago. I was much pleased to hear him. His subject was, "What must we do to be saved?" The clergy are very much agitated over it, and nearly all of them preached on Ingersollism, but they didn't make much impression on the minds of sensible people. None of them tried to answer his argument, but it was mostly abuse. I heard a man say it was a wonder that God did not cut Ingersoll's career short. I told him it was no wonder at all; it only demonstrated the fact that God is not a Christian; if he was, he would hav done so long ago, or never suffered him to hav lived at all. I will close, while I remain ever, Your friend and well-wisher,

C. E. EDGERLY.

NORTH YAMHILL, OREGON, April 12 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find five dollars. In sending this small remittance, I hope you will not think it the want of true and sympathetic friends in this far-off portion of the United States. I believe there are those even here who are fully sensible of the great outrage perpetrated on an honest and sincere, patriotic and upright, citizen in sending you to a felon's cell. There has been no act under the sanction of law and the government come under my observation that has so aroused my indignation.

If our freedom is subject to the ignorance, superstitions, and prejudice engendered in the minds of the people from the teachings of the Christian religion, as evinced in the conduct of Benedict, Comstock, and others who aid and abet them in their holy crusade against a free press, free speech, and a free dissemination of thought and mind all over our land, then surely a government founded on principles calculated to giv these very things to its citizens is in a sad plight indeed.

Go ahead, Bennett, with the good work. There must be martyrs to all great reforms. No doubt to-day you feel much better in your conscience. No doubt the world regards you as a much better man than he who stooped to such contemptible means to secure your incarceration in a prison. Cheer up, brother, as I hope you are among the last of the martyrs. Sympathetically yours.

LEE LAUGHLIN.

HALIFAX, N. S, May 2, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $8. While I cannot be with you to-night at the grand Reception given to you at Chickering Hall, I send my greeting to welcome you back to the editorial chair, assuring you that you hav my full indorsement as a man of truth, honor, and integrity, and may the pen that you hav been accustomed to wield again be wielded with that weighty power and resoluteness that will carry conviction into the hearts of thousands that are under the domineering influence of priestcraft, and release them from the chains that bind them to superstition, intolerance, and hatred towards their fellow-men! The work that you hav done for humanity since the advent of THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot be estimated by a common standard. Millions yet unborn will stand in astonishment at the grand results achieved in the last quarter of the nineteenth century by D. M Bennett. I can, to some extent, realize the unbounded feelings of joy that animate the whole being of hundreds of thousands that you are again at liberty, at your post of honor, ready to battle for the right and to condemn the wrong in whatever channel it may be found. So go on with your keen, incisive, and decisive blade of truth. Spare not, for the Car of Progress must roll on; and whoever is foolish enough to attempt to impede its progress will be crushed under its ponderous wheels of truth. The befogging elements of Christian hatred, intolerance, and injustice must be swept from our fair land, and upon its shattered ruins must be built the broad and liberal elements of human brotherhood in the domain of doing the greatest good to the greatest number. Malice toward none, but charity for all. I am, as ever, your friend,

CHAS. YEAKE.

DELPHOS, OHIO, May 4, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am happy to think that you now are free to again inhale the sweet odors of truth-seeking. The pious frauds that caused your unjust imprisonment can no longer rejoice over your confinement.

Truly yours, B. A. ROLOSON.

NEW YORK, May 8, 1880.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: Allow me to congratulate you on your being in New York again. I had the pleasure of seeing you in the distance late on Sunday evening last. I trust that your trials are over and that your sufferings in the past will contribute largely to the liberalizing of the minds of the people of this country and of the world.

Fraternally yours. E. P. COOLEY.

GLENDALE, MON., April 20, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: The approaching release of Mr. Bennett from the Christian institution at Albany, admonishing me that I am somewhat in arrears with my mite of promised contribution during his sojourn with the Philistines, will be my excuse for trespassing at present on your time. My fears are happily dispelled in regard to his health and power of endurance. I fancy he has improved, if possible, intellectually, however he may physically, his aroused enthusiasm and acute imagery evinced by his description of the convocation of the gods. That he has survived the persecution and opprobrium heaped upon him, without a scintilla of evidence of his guilt, but meant to drive him to lunacy or the grave, is proving, and will prove, a sad mistake of the modern Inquisition in seeking to enforce a doctrine repugnant to natural reason and incompatible with common sense. We are asked, under pains and penalties, to accept the myths and fantasies of a crude, effete, and barbarous origin—the conceptions of men but slightly in advance of the early dwellers of the caves. As well be expected to swallow the antics of the "leprahaun," the weird warning of the "banshee" of Milesian notoriety, or the "lookooroo," the offspring of French imagining and papal pronunciamentoes. But I must spare you, and forbear these incoherent ramblings. I am solicitous about the Reception; hope it will be a grand success. Find inclosed ten dollars. When you take out the greenbacks, drop this quietly in the waste-basket, first tendering my grateful thanks to all the "boys" in the office, and don't you forget it; I thank the "devil" also.

Yours sincerely, WM. KINSELLA.

EUDORA, KAN., May 8, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: A Liberal picnic was held on the first day of May at the residence of C. M. Sears, in this place, to celebrate the release of D. M. Bennett. The day was delightful, and a beautiful American flag was early flung to the breeze and waved majestically from the top of the highest tree. The shady grove was tastefully and conveniently arranged for the occasion, and included a speakers' stand, seats, tables, croquet sets, swings, arches, target shooting, and a platform for dancing. Enlivening music was also dispensed by the Doolittle string band.

The meeting was organized by electing C. M. Sears Chairman. Mr. L. Greene took the stand and delivered a very eloquent and appropriate address upon the principles of Liberalism and toleration, which was highly appreciated and frequently applauded by the large and intelligent audience.

An essay was read by Mrs. M. A. Sears, entitled, "Make Our Lives Happy Here," which was well received.

The dinner was a grand and substantial affair—a feast of good things unsurpassed for richness and variety, to which all present appeared to do ample justice.

Attracted by the music, the audience soon gathered again around the stand and listened attentively to short, stirring speeches by L. Rote, C. M. Sears, L Greene, and others.

A poem, written for the occasion, entitled, "May day Thoughts Suggested by the Release of D M. Bennett," was well rendered by W. H. Sears, and elicited much applause.

A committee on resolutions reported the following, which, on motion, were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we believe the government should neither abolish nor support any form of religion in any manner, neither directly by the payment of money nor indirectly by exemption from tax.

Resolved, That we believe in the complete secularization of the government.

Resolved, That our sympathies hav been with D. M. Bennett throughout his term of imprisonment, and that we now congratulate him on his release.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication.

Perfect harmony and social accord prevailed during the day, and all appeared to enjoy themselves. The young people tripped the light fantastic toe until a late hour, when all retired to their respective abodes, feeling that the day had been pleasantly and profitably spent. The question of procuring lecturers and organizing a Liberal League was discussed, and I think we may succeed in that undertaking.

I hope to be able to send you a list of new subscribers to your grand paper soon. I will close by wishing you and your noble wife a long life, success, and happiness, and all the Liberal workers in the good cause.

Yours for truth and universal liberty, C. M. SEARS.

PATERSON, N. J., May 15, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I in common (as it appears by to-day's TRUTH SEEKER) with thousands of other Liberals throughout the country, hav had my sense of decency, justice, and honor outraged, and that in a most cowardly manner, by the receipt of that pamphlet, but as soon as I saw what it was I put it in the stove, where I hope and trust all the rest were as quickly consigned. My greatest interest in the vile thing for the few moments that I held it in my hands, was to find some one's name to it, but I hunted in vain. And no wonder, for even Comstock himself, were he worse than he really is, would surely hesitate ere he stooped to such a mean, dirty, vile trick as this in order to blast the life and reputation of an honored citizen. This pamphlet, very appropriately, was mailed from Boston, but I can scarcely imagine that there is any Liberal in the boundary of that honored and illustrious city who could be so base as to engage in such despicable and utterly contemptible work. And right here I want to say to all these "things" that are engaged in this muddy business, that in future whenever they feel inclined to defile the mails and violate Comstock's obscenity law, they will please drop my name from the list of those to whom they find a pleasure in sending such filth. And in contrast with this, I most anxiously desire to thank all those noble men who hav stood true and steadfast, and women who hav done their duty openly and fearlessly by sticking to you through this trying ordeal. And such names as Parton, Wright, Palmer, Green, Pillsbury, Seaver, the Dentons, Mrs. A. H. Colby, Mrs. L. N. Colman, Amy Post, Mrs. E. D. Slenker, and a host of others, will, by all who love truth, justice, fidelity, and honor, be held in lasting remembrance because they loved right and justice more than a fleeting popularity among those who murder truth and justice, and yet delight in saying, "I am holier than thou." And in conclusion I wish to add that I am more and more convinced of the imperative necessity of all Liberal men and women of this country, and lovers of humanity the world over, sticking closer together, working more harmoniously than hitherto, and making the fight more aggressive against bigotry, religious persecution, and injustice of every kind.

Since writing the above, I hav read your "Personal," and I cannot close without saying how deeply I regret the course that Mr. and Mrs. Underwood hav taken since the split at Syracuse. They were two of my most esteemed friends in the Liberal camp, and consequently I am the more deeply pained. I most sincerely hope that ere long they will clearly see their mistake and hav courage enough to acknowledge it and ever after employ their splendid abilities in the good work of bringing those into the Liberal ranks who are now estranged. JOHN WARR.

NORWAY, IOWA., May 10, 1880.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: Welcome once more to the editorial chair of THE TRUTH SEEKER! May you be undisturbed in its occupancy until the end of your days. You hav well earned the right to rest and peace, but I hav no doubt but that you will still

> "Lift aloft in battle's van > Emblems of enfranchised man."

This hour we greet you upon your return from the martyr's prison cell and say unto you, "Welcome, good and faithful servant."

We know your services to the cause, know the sturdy defense which you hav given to the right, and not all the malice of your open or secret enemies can avail to turn from you the steadfast loyalty of our hearts, for we know that you hav suffered for us and liberty.

The church and its landmarks in iniquity hav tried to crush you and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

This was natural, and for it there is this measure of excuse, that between you there was and is a state of war.

But the church and her adjuncts hav been aided in their nefarious work by a brood of vile traitors within our own ranks who hav done all in their power to bury you beneath a mountain of obloquy and foul defamation. For these things they do not deserve the name of men—there is, there can be no excuse. Their action is cowardly and contemptible beyond measure. They are of the same foul spawn of those traitors to Freethought who in England hav done all in their little power to drag down and destroy the indomitable Charles Bradlaugh and the beautiful and heroic Annie Besant.

But the transatlantic vampires hav failed, as hav their brothers in vileness on this side of the water.

The latest despicable work of the American Arnold's is an eight page pamphlet sent out under letter postage from Boston. In the guise of an attack upon you directly and Moses Hull indirectly, it is a deliberate attempt to destroy the cause of Liberalism in this country. The cowardly miscreants who send it out dare not affix their forever infamous names to the dirty libel.

Let me say to you, Bro. Bennett, beware of every man from whose speeches or writings these anonymous assassins draw comfort and assurance of support. Not many of them, it is likely, are privy to this last malicious and envious attack upon you and the League, but they hav all shown a strange lack of perception of the real issue and of courage.

The Reception seems to hav been a glorious success. The speeches were excellent, and without exception; there was no "let down" in the letters and messages received.

But it is the resolutions adopted that are the crowning glory of the whole meeting. They are the best set of resolutions adopted by any Liberal gathering since this battle commenced.

Thev say just what needed to be said and they do not say a word too much. In them we find concise, truthful statements of facts, clear cut, unequivocal demands, and a superb spirit of freedom and brave defiance of accredited systems of iniquity and falsehood.

There is not a single cowardly concession in them, not a single evasion of time-serving denial, not a single protest that we are not in favor of obscenity.

All the world knows, or might know if it did not wilfully shut its eyes to the light of facts, that of all the abominators of real obscenity (lack of reverence for the sexual nature) the most advanced and radical Liberals hold it in the greatest loathing and contempt.

It has been even charged that the tendency of Freethought was to lead men to the commission of all crimes. Shall we therefore insert in every platform and set of resolutions adopted a protest that we are not in favor of murder, and lying, and stealing, and arson, and rape? Not so, and no more should we be continually getting down upon our knees and meekly vowing that we are not in favor of indecency because we demand the repeal of an unconstitutional, iniquitous, and invasive statute. These resolutions are good, they perpetrate no such infernal folly.

No. 11 makes no concessions, but it is so worded that it spikes every effal gun of the filth fiends.

With these resolutions and the demands of Liberalism held ever aloft as our bright and shining banner let the Liberal League and the friends of the secular state swing grandly into line and charge with an irresistible onset upon the embattled hosts of superstition and tyranny, and continue charging until the last stronghold of injustice is razed to the ground. E. C. WALKER.

P. S—I would say to the Liberals of Iowa that the earnest brother, W. S. Bell, is now ready to make engagements for lectures in this state. Write to him at once, as it is necessary that arrangements should be consummated as far in advance of time of delivering lecture as possible. Forget not the loyal hearts of oak.

Address Bro. Bell at 707 West Superior street, Chicago, Ill., E. C. W.

PORTLANDVILLE, N. Y., May 3, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I rejoice with you at the opening of the prison door. Do not hold your head down, nor mantle your face for neither king, president, nor priest.

We hav a pile of powder in store and it only requires the touch of a match to blow the persecuting Christians from existence.

We do not believe in taking the sword only in self-defense. If we are compelled therefore to unsheath our sword, we mean business. Then woe to the man that has raised his weapon to strike down liberty, the freedom of thought and speech. I verily believe the day is not far distant when Comstock and some of his crew will regret that they were ever born. There is a tempest brewing which when it breaks will try every man's steel. Then let the man who has no sword sell his garment and buy one. Our liberty is as dear to us as to others, and we will hav it or die.

Mr. Bennett, I hav great fears that there will be another attempt made upon your person. There is a religious sect that are thirsting after your blood, and they will use no scruples to effect their evil designs. Be watchful therefore and do not expose yourself unnecessarily; we hav a work for you that no other can do. With much respect I am very truly yours, PETER SOULE.

SPENCER, IOWA, May 4, 1880.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I believe I hav not yet sent pay for the current year of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and herewith inclose post-office order of five dollars for it and a copy of "Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief" as proposed, which please send by mail if Anthony will allow it, and I will do all the good I can with it, as we hav some badly "hide-bound" people here.

I heartily congratulate you upon your late release from dungeon walls, and sincerely hope that through your sufferings the citizens of this country may be made better, and may guard our most sacred rights with better care in future.

Yours truly, J. MERRITT.

LINES TO OUR CHAMPION D. M. BENNETT.

There is much in this world very hard to endure,
Sorely wounding the feelings and painful to sight.
But surely those know of the bitterest woe
Who stand up for the cause they believe to be right.

Thousands hav suffered in dungeons and chains,
Well proving how cruel injustice can blight.
But what children of men since the ages began
Hav suffered like those who stand up for the right?

All times hav their heroes we fain would admire,
Whose courage and daring so proudly delight,
But we challenge the name of a hero so grand
As of him who stands up for the cause that is right.

We are told that we liv in an age far advanced,
And civilized up to a standard polite,
But giv us the warrior though ever so rough
Whose sword is unsheathed for the cause that is right.

Though scorned and brow-beaten and slandered and cursed,
Unswerving, undaunted 'mid scenes which affright,
In the heart's sacred chancel enshrine we the name
Of those who are bravely defending the right.

VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

NASHVILLE, TENN., April 25, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Regretting the circumstances preventing us from meeting with you and friends, as the term of your unjust imprisonment ends, we send you thousands of cheers and congratulations. Rejoicing as you will in the hardly-earned and regained freedom, your numerous friends in bonds with you exult with equal joy and gladness. As the few dejected Baptist friends of Bunyan, imprisoned in a darker religious age, and under a more intolerant government, warmly greeted the brave old man as he came from the clutches of heartless tyrants, much more may we greet you on your return to freedom, The apostle enjoins to "weep with them that weep and rejoice with them that rejoice." Were this authority binding upon us at this hour, we were forced into sackcloth and ashes, with Comstock & Co., over your release. But we appeal to the little stock of Christian charity which may still smoulder in their hearts, to patiently let our rejoicing cool ere we get into humiliation, fasting, and prayer, over the escape one suffering victim from their inquisition. Then would we likewise appeal to their reason and scant knowledge of history, that we are laboring to save them no less than ourselves from religious oppressions and tortures. The inspired slaughters of Joshua, the massacres of Moses as detailed in such scriptures as Numbers xxxi, may be repeated as one denomination shall gain the power over all others. The past history of Christianity makes this but too evident. Our only safety is in a thorough recognition of the inalienable rights of all, leaving truth and reason free to combat error in all its forms and at all times—as Jefferson wisely taught.

If religious bigotry and persecutions are to fade out in our republic, the happy result will be due to free thought, an honest, earnest love of truth, and minds Liberalized by the Liberal sciences.

Rejoicing in the hope and cheering prospects of the triumph of these happy elevating influences, and that you, D. M. Bennett, will bear your full part in this great work, we are and ever will be your fast friends.

W. T. AUTEN,
W. PERKINS.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, May 2, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: May all that is good conspire to help you, and may the devil deal with Comstock, Benedict and company as they deal with others. Inclosed is five dollars from your venerable friend and well-wisher R. Mc Intosh, who requested me to forward it to you; he also sends five to H. L. Green. Your ever well-wisher,

BURLINGTON, IOWA, April 29, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: By way of "hurrah" on the day of your liberation I hav set floating to the breeze, on a tall flag pole which stands in my garden, two beautiful new flags, American and Swiss (I hav the glory of having been born a Swiss), and as our place is a very conspicuous spot, the show looks pretty and creates much inquiry. This gives a fellow the opportunity of making pointed little speeches about people being ignorant of to-day's history in consequence of reading nothing except the daily press, etc., etc. My wife, myself, and a few more friends and admirers of yours here, unite in sending you greeting and congratulate you on your liberation from the grip of the Pharisees.

Yours enthusiastically, WERNER BOECKLIN.

DURAND, ILL., April 29, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find $5 to pay for your new book when published. I do not know what the price will be; if this is not enough I will send the balance; if it is too much keep the balance for yourself. This must be a happy day for you. I would much like to be in New York to meet you. I hope you will not hav any more experiences of the kind, and that prosperity and success may attend you in your declining years.

Yours for man, E. R. EVANS.

AMHERST, MASS., April 30, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: I congratulate you as a free man once more, as I suppose that you are indeed free since yesterday. Hope that your health is good considering where you hav been. Hope that you will liv long to go on with the work for the emancipation of bigoted minds like your persecutors. I beat you out of jail by two months, but then I was incarcerated nearly two months before you. There was only a couple of weeks' difference in your favor, or rather, I should say, against you. You had the longer imprisonment and the harder place to serve it out in. Am so glad that you lived through it. They will not be idiotic enough to proceed against you again, as they hav felt the power of Liberal thought in your case. Three cheers for your release! Fraternally, JOHN BROWN SMITH.

LOGOOTEE, IND., April 30, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: For this $1 send me R. G. Ingersoll's "Lecture on Gods," etc., paper covers, and apply the residue on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I suppose you hav been liberated from prison where you hav been expiating the terrible crime of giving fetterless expressions of honest thought through your Infidel paper. The sky pilots hav enslaved the human mind in the debasing coils of theology for ages. We look back through the foggy mists of centuries and we find every generation sacrificing the noblest of humanity on the altar of superstition. Brave men expire in flames kindled by intolerance. Many swords, guillotines, and other Christian instruments hav been stained with the blood of brave thinkers. The history is familiar to every thinker. While you hav filled a Christian dungeon you are fortunate that such men hav preceded you who, by their efforts and with their lives, hav rendered the bigot's stake unpopular. Continue to do as much good as you can, they cannot burn you, though they may imprison you. ABEL PAGET.

COLON, MICH., April 29, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Friend of Human Freedom: Our spirits hav gone out and along the invisible wires and we seem to see you emerging from your prison home into the arms of your wife and friends; and as I look out into the beautiful sunshine we can't help but think that even the elements are weeping with us tears of joy for your restoration. May you liv to see the nations rise up and call you blessed. We extend to you our hands and hearts. Truly yours,

DR. AND MRS. A. J. KINNE.

NORTH MADISON, O., May 1, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: I will write a few lines to you, as I suppose you are now at home with your wife and friends. I wrote one letter to you while you were in prison; don't know as you got it; should hav written more but I knew you would hav as many as you could read and better than I could write. No day has come and gone but I hav thought of you. I hav felt so mad I should like to hav heard Comstock was dead and gone to hell and staid as long as you were in prison. I hope you will giv all the damnation you can pile on to them. Had I the power they should drink one vial apiece of the double-distilled wrath of God, and boiled down at that.

Don't be discouraged; giv the churches and the Young Men's Christian Association a worse shaking than it has ever had before. Crosby, Bundy, and Abbot, recollect them. I should like to see you and take you by the hand, but can't in this world. Well, I don't expect to see anything in any other. I read all the books I hav had of you, and I say if God won't move a finger to prevent the suffering of the innocent we might as well be without one. I want many more books but can't pay for them. So good bye, God bless you, is my wish. One of your best friends.

LEE NORTON.

AUBURN, N. Y., May 3, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I hav to-day just seen leisure time to read your valuable paper of April 10th, which contains your ninth letter from Albany, which is the glorious "cap-sheaf" of all your previous efforts. If I believed in the answering of prayers, I would at once prostrate myself before some Christian God and implore of him in the best of devotional language to actuate each and every one of his worshipers to thoroughly study and cherish the infinitely truthful precepts proclaimed by Jesus Christ through Mercury to D. M. Bennett. Oh, what a grand lesson would then be inculcated into the minds of deluded knaves, fanatical hypocrites, and licentious imaginary God worshipers. It seems to me that if those noble, Christlike characteristics could only be infused, inwrought, inborn into the sensibilities of all the world's mythical Christian God-serving people, the world would soon come forth wholly redeemed, rejuvenated from all Christian intolerance, bigotry, and superstition, clothed in the armor of right, truth, justice, and love.

Since reading your "Ninth Letter from Albany," I am still a greater admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I cannot and will not do without it. I hav become its friend since its brave, daring, outspoken editor became a victim of wicked, intolerant Christian bigotry, and now since your liberation the rank and file of Christianity will proclaim its hilarity by calling upon their demon God to end your days in their foaming, boiling-over hell, the temperature of which has been greatly increased during your imprisonment by their hellish prayerful vociferations. Ye Christian hypocrites, I challenge you to read D. M. Bennett's "Ninth Letter from Albany," and dare you to deny one single word of it. But then, if you can believe and own your pretended word of God, no doubt you can disbelieve and deny Bennett's "positive word" of truth. But will you and dare you deny the truth?

Now, Mr. Editor, please also consider this communication as an order for your new and unparalled production, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." I must hav the work complete, Vols. I. and II. I believe it to be the grandest work of the kind ever written, and certainly must reflect great credit upon its famous editor. Every Liberal ought to hav it; his library is incomplete without it. As soon as both volumes are finished please send them to me, in leather, by express, C. O. D., or notify me, and I will order them by mail, which would be cheaper, and the difference in transmission I will contribute to the dissemination of truth.

Yours for the glorious advancement,

L. DE WITT GRISWOLD.

GLENDALE, MON. TER., April 25, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The suggestion of Mr. Leland in regard to the reception is a good one, and ought to be acted upon by at least those who are deprived of the opportunity of showing their appreciation of Mr. Bennett's services in a more demonstrative manner, by sending in a new subscriber. Such here is mine. But, by all means, let us hav the reception also. Mr Macdonald, take the old chief by the hand for me, and giv it an extra shake, and say welcome, hearty welcome. Inclosed find $3, and send the paper for one year to a new subscriber.

Yours truly, WM. KINSELLA.

OBITUARY.

WALLA WALLA, WASH. TER., April 22, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: We hav just received the painful information of the death of John Cleminson (my wife's grandfather). He passed away in the full belief of Spiritualism. He had held to that faith for twenty-five years, and it did not forsake him in his last hours. He had been ill but a short time, but refused to take medicine. He said he wanted to go and see his wife who had gone on some six years before, and with whom he had lived in perpetual harmony for fifty years. The old gentleman lived a very temperate life. He lacked one month of his eighty-first birthday. You, as well as we, hav lost a true and faithful friend. To him I owe my introduction to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think he began with its birth and remained a constant subscriber until his death.

Your well wisher, WILLIS MCDANNALD.

The following dispatch and two letters were sent to Mr. Wright at Chickering Hall on the evening of the Reception, but for some reason were not delivered:

ELGIN, ILL., May 2, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, CHICKERING HALL, CARE HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT: We congratulate you upon your release.

Ever yours in sympathy,

ELGIN LIBERAL ASSOCIATION.

WOODHULL, ILL., April 29, 1880.

BRO. D. M. BENNETT, Respected Sir: A few months more will close my eightieth year of pilgrimage. As for my bodily ability, it is such it would be imprudent for me to make the attempt to greet you in person; and as for funds, I am at present short. Under my circumstances, I ask the privilege of greeting you with pen and paper. In fact, it is the only means at my command. Therefore you will accept my best wishes for your prosperity through the balance of your journey as a pilgrim on earth, and I shall be happily disappointed if you are permitted to enjoy your freedom. Priestcraft, ignorance, and religious intolerance are a power in the land, and it has fallen to your lot to be a target for the arrows of religious tyrants, but don't get hit in the back. I bid you welcome to the light of day and to the society of your friends and your home,

Respectfully yours, ISAAC PADEN.

SHAKERS, N. Y., May 2, 188.

LIBERAL FRIENDS: The man whom you so worthily honor is the trusted friend of all the prominent and honorable of Shaker societies. As we consider our honor and purity of life, when governed by Shaker principles, to be unequaled by any and impeachable, you will know how highly we appreciate Bennett as a defender of what he believes to be pure and right, as he sees the pure and right, and that we realize that we hav not misinterpreted nor mistaken our man when relying upon the honor and principles of your honored guest. While we only hope if there is an Anthony Comstock's hell hereafter, that he may merit only his full share, no more, and the Lord knows that will be many times more than Albany Penitentiary inflictions, according to the decrees of his faith, we pray you, pile the honor and applause upon D. M. Bennett, who has, to my knowledge, been an heroic martyr for the liberality of pure thought and speech, unequaled by any martyr in centuries preceding the nineteenth. I am, gentlemen, Yours,

G. A. LOMAS.

A Sentiment.

'Tis a sintimint, is it, ye's wantin'
To take wid ye's away to the West?
Be me sowl, thin, av all in me knowledge,
The few follyin' words are the best.

To be slow in yer judgment av others,
To stand fast to the flag ye've unfurl'd,
To yourself be the truest whin lovin,
An' the divil a bit mind the wurld.

An' thin if there's time for more goodness,
Be the gorra's, be hook or be crook!
Liv as near as yez can to the rule that's Called "Gowlden" forninst the big book.

An' be that same token
Some are sayin' 'twas Christ; but Confucius
Was the man who invinted that same
But so long as it's good, an' well followed,
Divil a matter it makes what's the name.

SARAH F. NORTON.

That Fountain.

We want no fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins,
We want pure, upright, honest men,
Men free from guilty stains.

We want no dying thieves to see
A fountain filled with gore,
We want men that do right because
It's right, and nothing more.

We want no "precious lamb of God"
For us to e'er be slain,
We want no heaven if we must wade
To it through bloody stains.

E'er since the gospel was first preached
Of the atoning blood,
It's always been a curse to man,
'Twill ne'er do any good.

Then lay that ensign of the past
Forever in the grave,
And let some other banner float,
That has some power to save.

'Twill be the emblem of true love,
Forever may it be
A beacon light to guide mankind
Through all eternity.

AND

RELICION OF HUMANITY.

THIRD EDITION, with CHART and INTRODUCTION. By T. B. WAKEMAN, Esq.
Just out. Price, 25 cents.

KNOW THYSELF!

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled The Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than fifty valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth: price only $1, sent by mail post-paid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers by permission to JOS. S. FISHER, President; W. I. P. INGRAHAM, vice-President; W. PAINE, M.D.; C. S. GAUNTT, M.D.; H. J. DUCUET, M.D.; R. H. KLINE, M.D.; J. R. HOLCOMB, M.D.; N. R. ## Revelations of Antichrist

CONCERNING

Christ and Christianity.

"This volume gives us mountains of evidence that the Christ of the Bible was never born, never crucified, never died. . . . It contains more deep researches into the far back pages of antiquity than any volume I ever read. ANTICHRIST proves from history that James Kepha (Cephas, alias Peter), and Paul, all lived before the Christian era, and so did Jesus Christ—indeed, many Christs and many by the name of Jesus. . . . In my precious collection of Liberal works I hav placed this last valuable acquisition first and foremost of all."

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave, New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR in person or by mail FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED.

"SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES"

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Another Extraordinary Book!

Sixteen Saviors or None;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED IN MODERN THOUGHT.

BY HENRY C. PEDDER.

Extra cloth, beveled, black and gold back and side stamps, 12mo, 185 pp., price, $1.00.

Everything that we now deem of antiquity was at one time new; and what we now defend by examples will at a future period stand as precedents.—Tacitus.

An admirably written, scholarly volume.—N. Y. Graphic.

He presents a safe guide through the bewildering labyrinth of scientific, philosophical, and theological speculations, and evinces a thorough familiarity with most of the modern theories advanced.—Jewish Times.

The author of this volume has evidently kept company with many of the finer spirits of the age, until his mind has become imbued with the fragrance of their thought. He has excellent tendencies, elevated tastes, and sound aspirations.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

BY L. FEUERBACH,

Author of "The Essence of Christianity," etc.

Translated from the German.

Cloth, 12mo, 75pp., 50 cts. (Formerly 75 cts.)

The spirit of the time is show, not substance. Our politics, our ethics, our religion, our science, is a sham. The truth-teller is ill-mannered, therefore immoral. Truthfulness is the immorality of our age!—Extract.

Infidel Integrity versus Christian Creed.
Separation of Church and State.
The Spiritual Philosophy, what it is and what it is not.
The Sunday Question.
Thomas Paine, Patriot and Hero.
Crime and its Causes; or, What shall we do to be saved?
After Liberalism, What?
Life beyond the Grave.
Jesus Christ, the Reformer.
The Three Tyrannies.
The Old Error and the New Truth.
The Scientific Aspect of Prayer, etc., etc.

VOLUNTARY OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

A lecture replete with eloquence.—San Francisco Chronicle.

She is a powerful advocate of the cause she has espoused.—San Jose Mercury.

Mrs. Lake is the best lady lecturer that has ever appeared before a Portland audience.—Portland Oregonian.

As a speaker she is vastly superior to any woman we hav ever heard; for beauty of diction, depth of thought, and grace in delivery she is remarkable.—Salem (Or.) Record.

She has the power of entrancing her audience, and, by her eloquence, commanding the respect of those most opposed to her.—Corvallis Gazette.

Mrs. Lake is one of the finest orators we hav ever listened to. Can hardly be excelled by any speaker on this coast, either man or woman.—Ureka Journal.

Her eloquence and masterly style giv evidence of a highly cultivated mind as well as a complete comprehension of her subject.—Eureka (Nev.) Sentinel.

Whatever cause she espouses has in her an advocate of more power and brilliancy than is usually found on the rostrum, and her influence will be felt wherever she goes.—Council Bluffs Nonpareil.

Pleasant appearance, graceful carriage, a good elocutionist, eloquent, using well-chosen language to express her ideas.—Clinton Herald.

Mrs. Lake is a brilliant speaker, finely cultured, a trained elocutionist, and a powerful advocate of truth, reason, and constitutional liberty.—Le Claire Pilot.

She may be addressed, Clinton, Iowa.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Prof. Tyndall has inaugurated a new era in scientific development, and has drawn the sword in a battle whose clash of arms will presently resound through the civilized world. —N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Prof. Tyndall Crosses the Rubicon.—It is the opening address of the president of the most important convention of scientific men in th world. Every line of it breathes thought, power, eloquence. It is in many respects one of the most extraordinary utterance of our time.—N. Y. Tribune.

SOCIALISM.

A REPLY TO

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D. D.

BY AN INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST.

12mo, 67pp., 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against his passiveness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrine that government should merely "protect," he attacks, and insists that it should "assist," also. While he does not believe that "property is robbery," or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—N. Y. Herald.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

Extra cloth, 12mo, 206pp. Price $1.

The author's conception of a possible future life on this earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem, from a poor man's standpoint, will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "Society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectively.—Critical Review.

The Best on this Theme Yet.

"AN ESSAY ON THE BIBLE NARRATIVE OF CREATION."

By Augustus R. Grote, A.M.

The Boston Commonwealth says: It is a rationalistic examination of the scripture account, with a conclusion that the literal teaching of the theory is injurious to the mind, as it proves an impediment to intellectual advancement.

The Boston Traveler says: He has given a clear, yet condensed, criticism from the literary and scientific points of view. An eloquent and forcible protest against the tyranny of dogma. He endeavors to show that all efforts to reconcile science with a literal interpretation of the account of Genesis must only end in confusion.

The Popular Science Monthly says: The discrepancies between the two accounts are very fully indicated, and the different points of view from which they were written explained. . . . Interesting chapters follow on the myths of the old world, which resemble those of Genesis. . . . The book is characterized by directness of argument, and the best material has been diligently used. . . . The archæologist and philologist will find many new points in the book, which is noteworthy for its additions to science as well as for its distinctive literary merits. Paper 40 cents. For sale by D. M. BENNETT.

READ THIS LIST OF STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT, 141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15 00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Gems of Thought.

RIGHT thinking involves free thinking. If to know the truth makes us free, freedom, again, is the conviction of knowing the truth.

SAKE's alive! don't know it's so, but the Lo'd seems to pay a mighty sight of 'tention to some folks and forgit all about the rest. 'Pears like chillun ought to be looked after, anyhow. They aint, though, half on 'em. Things is queer in this world, even if it is the Lo'd's world.—Aunt Ruth's Valentine.

THE Jesuitical confession implies the abdication of personal will—of individual responsibility. Man, in the hands of a confessor, must be—these are the very words of the book—"like a corpse which can be moved about in all ways without resistance; like a shaft in the hands of an old man." Not only obedience, but blind obedience, must be practiced. This is what I call an immorality; the faculty, which ought to enlighten man, blinding itself; the moral agent discharging itself of its terrible, but glorious, responsibility on to a stranger. Even supposing this strange abdication, this monstrous substitution, took place in behalf of all virtues, it nevertheless constitutes a fundamental immorality.—Loyson.

THE monks in their cells, the middle ages in their bondage to kings, priests, and ignorance, possessed no great consciousness of free agency, and hence that was the generation to ignore man and enthrone a pitless fate under the name of God; but the age which, in a perfectly free country, permits every man to carve out for himself a happiness and education and fame is the age to develop the consciousness of free agency, and hence the age to bind men together—man and God as acting in concert. Political freedom develops the human consciousness of free will and responsibility.—David Swing.

WHAT sort of infallibility is that which has tolerated the Inquisition, applauded the St. Bartholomew massacre, preached crusade against the heretics in France, massacred the Protestants of Holland, burned ten thousand at the stake in Spain? If it be said that Protestants also hav persecuted, we reply that they did it against their own principles, but that the Catholics persecuted in accordance with theirs; and the church which claims exclusive infallibility and holiness has no right to excuse itself because it has done no more than those which it denounces as being in error and sin.—Dr. J F. Clarke.

I SHOULD be glad if any pen words of mine might bring Catholics and Protestants into better acquaintance and into gentler and kindlier relations than before; but I desire to see no conversions from the one to the other side. An exchange from one dogmatism to another is seldom happy. For the rest, that is the best religion for one which fits one best. There is no universal religion. The notion that there is has filled the earth with horrors and wailing until now. All organized religions are alike—human growths from roots of error. To esteem one divine at the expense of the rest is a pure partisan superstition.—Waters.

A GOOD God (who, however, would necessarily be a finite being for us to hold the supposed relation to him), and a communication from him, I hav admitted to be desirable; but desire for a thing is no proof that the thing is attainable, or even that it has any other than an abstract existence in the mind. Taking actual religion, I cannot believe I can—not without lying to my own heart and understanding—call Christianity essentially different in its origin and nature from the other religions. I cannot believe in their divinity, neither can I believe in its. To me all religions are alike—human evolutions. The unwisdom of rating one of them above the rest as divinely superior in its origin and essence is as clear as anything can possibly be.—Waters.

THE aspect of the universe is not what Dr. Dewey says it is. It is not of "beneficence and intelligence," but has a wide room for, and actually displays, a vast extent of the opposite qualities. Plague, pestilence, and famine; battle, murder, pain, cruelty, triumphant injustice, affliction of the innocent, ignorance, folly, wrong of all sorts, abound in that little spot of the universe with which we are acquainted. If a principle of goodness be necessary to account for goodness, then a principle of badness must be necessary to account for badness in the universe.—Waters.

IMMORTALITY DENIED BY THE LAUREATE.

Out of the Deep, my child, out of the Deep!
Where all that was to be in all that was Whirled for a million æons through the vast Waste dawn of multitudinous eddying light.

Out of the Deep, my child, out of the Deep!
Through all this changing world of changeless law,
And every phase of ever-hightening life,
And nine long months of ante-natal gloom,
With this last moon, this crescent—her dark orb
Touched with earth's light—thou comest, Darling Boy;
Our Own; a babe in lineament and limb
Perfect, and prophet of the perfect man;
Whose face and form are hers and mine in one
Indissolubly married, like our love.

Liv and be happy in thyself, and serve
This mortal race, thy kin, so well that men
May bless thee, as we bless thee, O young life,
Breaking with laughter from the dark; and may
The fated channel where thy motion livs
Be prosperously shaped and sway thy course
Along the years of haste and random youth
Unshattered, then full current through full man;
And last, in kindly curves, with gentlest fall,
By quiet fields, a slowly-dying power,
To that last Deep where we and thou art still.
—Alfred Tennyson.

Odds and Ends.

MADE of awl work—Shoes.

A PAPER speaks of a man who "died without the aid of a physician." Such instances are rare.

A SUDDEN kiss made a young lady in Indianna crazy. "Yes," adds an old bachelor, "crazy for more."

A YOUNG lady up town repels the domestic slander that she is "fluctuating." "For I am always at par—to buy me something."

A LITTLE girl being asked on the first day of school how she liked her new teacher, replied: "I don't like her; she is just as saucy to me as my mother."

THE waves of a woman's handkerchief hav wrecked many a man, and the waves of a woman's hand without the kerchief hav wrecked many a small boy.

THAT was a clever remark of young Spilkins, who was embracing his sweetheart, when he said he liked that position better than the one he held on the railroad.

"You can never wear those boots out," said a shoemaker. "Then I don't want them," replied the customer. "Do you suppose I want boots to wear in the house?"

IT is said that women liv on love. Small-salaried young men will be interested to know that the love referred to is for baked beans, beef soup, onions, and new spring hats.

ONE reason, says the Detroit Free Press, why Leadville has no schools is because all the schoolma'ams who go there find husbands between the depot and the hotels, and don't care a cent whether school keeps or not.

A VERY old lady on her death-bed, in a penitential mood, said, "I was a great sinner more than eighty years, and didn't know it." An old woman who had lived with her a long time exclaimed, "Lor! I knew it all the time."

As a lazy tramp came down the street,
With free and easy gait,
This welcome sign his eyes did greet,
"Free chop to those who wait."
"Now here," he said, "I'll get some food
Without the slightest tax;"
But they led him to a pile of wood,
And handed him an ax.

JAMES SMITH hugged and kissed a girl against her will in a Galveston street, and she had him arrested. He was fined $15, which he paid, and went home congratulating himself that he had got out of the scrape easily. But he was mistaken. His wife met him at the door with a rolling-pin, knocked him down, and pounded him until he was insensible.

JUSTICE SMITH'S LITTLE JOKE.—There were over a hundred prisoners arraigned in the Tombs Police Court last Sunday. The majority of them were individuals who had passed a hilarious Saturday night. One of the prisoners, George W. Cannon, stepped up to Justice Smith and said:

"If you please, I want to go off."

The magistrate laughed and replied:

"As it's dangerous to hold a cannon that wants to go off, I discharge you. Don't go off, though, till you get outside; we want no exploding cannons here."

Milton Willard, another prisoner, in an apologetic yet confident tone, said to his Honor:

"This is my first appearance, Judge."

"Yes," replied the magistrate, "but your appearance is that of having been drunk."

"'Twas only through friendship if your Honor please."

"Friendship," knowingly responded the court, "is a mild stimulant, and I dislike to punish any one who becomes intoxicated with it. You may go, but don't get drunk on the same drink again; that's all."

NEWSPAPERS of a certain tone and people of a certain disposition are quoting with malignant glee the following verses, which recently appeared in Deacon Richard Smith's Cincinnati Gazette:

Only two cats, yet they calmly reposed
On the rug by the fire, and no one supposed
That before sunset these kits would be
The victims of a tragedy.

Only a boy, yet he noticed those cats,
All snugly fixed as bugs in mats;
And on his phiz a grin was seen,
Like an imp's when planning something mean.

Only a sister saw that grin,
But she tumbled not to its meaning;
For of boys she knew not the chaotic emotions,
And of torturing cats she had very few notions.

Only a moment she left the room.
But that moment sealed the kittens' doom;
For when she returned no cats were there,
Yet she thought of no evil befalling the pair.

Only a string, yet in its knot
The caudal ends of the kits were fraught;
And now on the face of the boy that grin
Extended around from ears to chin.

Only a clothes line, yet it swung,
And on it by their tails were hung
The mild and gentle purring pair,
Topsy-turvy in the air.

Only confusion now occurred,
Yet the howls of cats were plainly heard,
And teeth and claws and blood and hair
In wild confusion mingled there.

Only two tails now might be seen
On the line where the cats and tails had been.
And though cats to hav nine lives are rated,
They thrive not when disintegrated.

Only fiddle strings and claws,
Only teeth and eyes and paws,
Only two waving tails above,
Are left to show what sport boys love.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases, Spermatorrhœa, and Impotency, as the result of self abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Syphilis positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured. All diseases of women such as Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, etc., treated with equal success.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS has within the last fifteen years treated thousands of cases of all diseases, many of which were looked on as past recovery, and in fact had been given up by their physicians to die; but by the aid of Dr. Fellows' valuable discoveries in medicine were restored to health, and are now living monuments to his skill. There are few physicians that hav attained the same eminence, or rather the same high position, in the art of healing as that of Dr. Fellows. His clear perception of disease and his great knowledge in preparing his medicines to reach the cause of the complaint intended, and at last subdue it, place the Doctor at the head of his profession.

PRIVATE MEDICAL COUNSELOR

Sent to any address, treating on the cause, effects, and cure of Spermatorrhœa, and containing cures sworn to before a magistrate, which is positive and convincing testimony to the Doctor's great skill.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential. Inclose two three cent stamps, and address as above.

[From the Western Reformer.]

is a highly educated and scientific physician. He has an original system of practice, and is perfectly reliable and trustworthy. We hav heard many flattering reports of his successful cures of diseases incident to humanity."

A Few Words About the Devil,

And Other Biogrphic al Sketches and Ess ys.

BY CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

Second edition, with Portrait and Autobiography. Extra cloth, gold back and side stamp, 12mo, 260 pp., price, $1 25.

Displays much learning and research.—The Democrat.

In fine, there is much that is noble about him.—The Advance.

His position is defined and defended in a spirit of reverence for the truth.—Chicago Eve. Journal.

In a handsome volume before us Chas. Bradlaugh has "A Few Words" to say "About the Devil." Mr. Bradlaugh has a right to his "few words," and the devil will, we presume, at no distant day, hav a "few words" to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, and will doubtless get the best of the argument.—Chicago Interior.

We should insist, were we in any way connected with the government of theological schools, on their perusal of this work by the youth fitting under our charge for the duties and the responsibilities of the pulpit. They will find Mr. Bradlaugh no common man, and they will be introduced by him to persons and thoughts which cannot fail to be of use in their professional studies.—New Haven Palladium.

Nathaniel Vaughan.

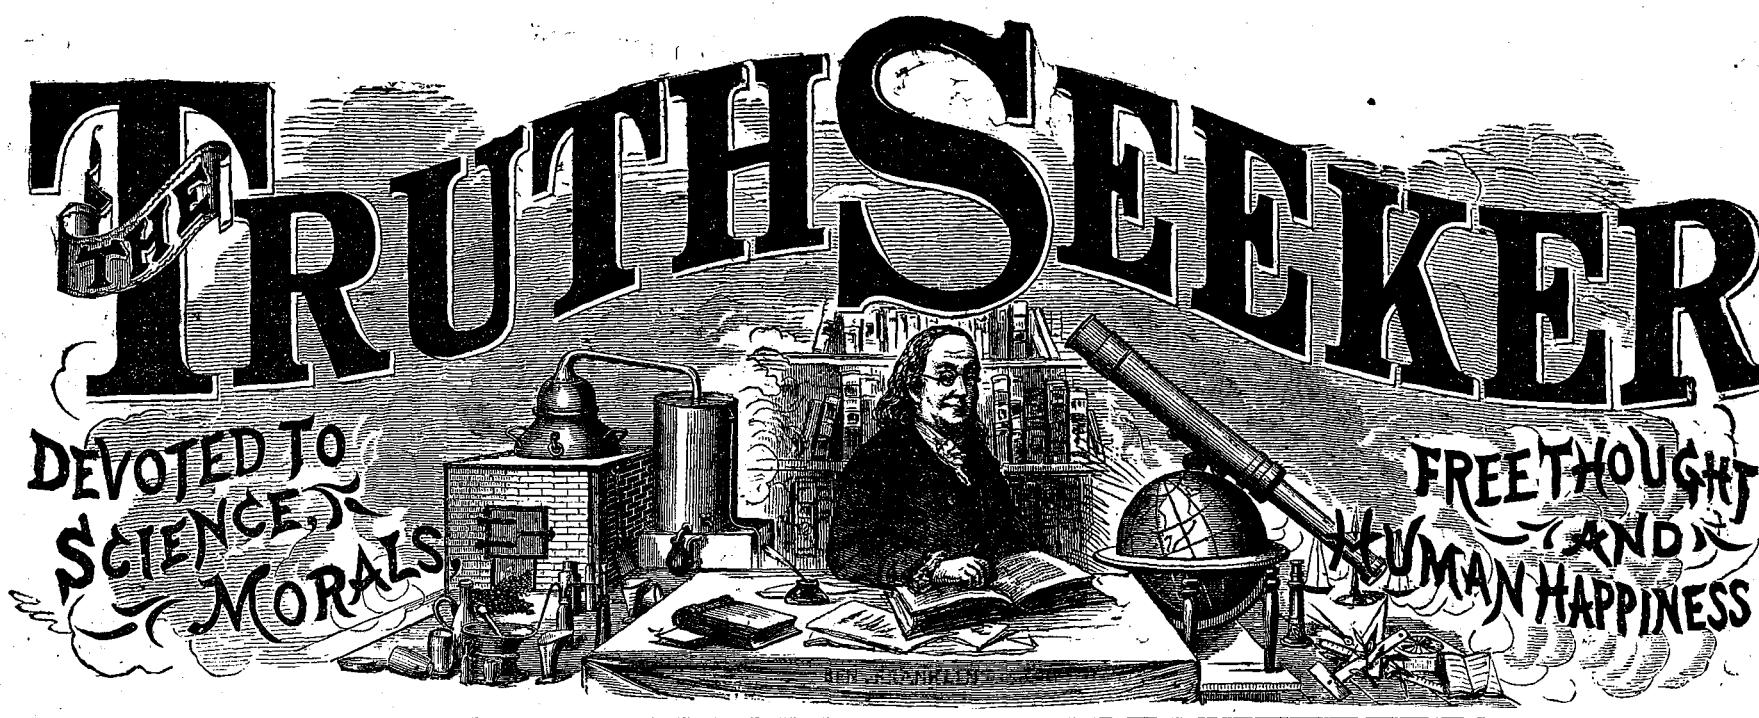
A NOVEL.

By FREDERIKA MACDONALD,

Author of "The Iliad of the East," "Xavier and I," etc., etc. Three volumes in one; extra cloth, beveled; black and gold back and side stamps; 12mo, 404 pp., $1.25.



The characters are set before us by a few graphic and able touches, not as puppets, but as living beings.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Power, eloquence, and originality characterize "Nathaniel Vaughan" to a degree very unusual among modern novels.—Illustrated London News.

An independent and respectable study of character in the law of circumstance such as even George Eliot might not hav been ashamed to own. It is really an artistic composition, with a sound moral expressed, though not obtruded, on the canvas.—Westminster Review.

Notes and Clippings.

THE sad news comes that the king of Central Africa, whom Stanley converted, has backslidden.

A PASTOR SUSPENDED.—The Rev. H. A. Grant has been suspended at Washington, Pa., for drunkenness and immorality.

GEN. J. W. PHELPS believes that tornadoes are electrical, and might be, in a measure, arrested by exploding small magazines of powder, or making a high flame. But would they hav time to try it?

A YOUNG Boston lawyer, who didn't believe in the immortality of the soul, was induced on one occasion to mix cider with his whisky, and he has been a member of the church ever since. —Andrews' Bazar.

IT is calculated that 30,000 passengers will sail for Europe this season. Allowing an expenditure of only $500 to each person, which is very low, we hav a total of $15,000,000 that will be spent out of the country.

WM. SMOAK, of Charleston, S. C., is ninety-seven years of age, and has 100 grandchildren, 391 great-grandchildren, and 70 great-great-grandchildren. It's nearly time for William to be "fired out."—Boston Globe. It is evident he doesn't intend to be smoaked out.

A CHURCH has been erected in Kansas at a cost of ten dollars in actual cash payment and something added for labor. The labor was furnished by the brethren belonging to the church, and given free of charge. The materials of the church are chiefly earth and sod. There will be no mortgage on this church.

A BOY fell into a vat of potash at Danielsonville, Mass., two years ago, and the skin of both legs was destroyed. A resort was had to skin grafting, and over 2,000 bits of cuticle, from the boy's mother, the family coachman, and several accommodating neighbors hav been used. The result is completely successful.

"A HYPOCRITE," said a Sunday-school teacher, "is a man who makes believe to be real good when he isn't. Sometimes a man will giv a lot of money to a church just to make people think that he is better than anybody else." "Well, my papa ain't a hypocrite," spoke up a little girl back in the corner of the seat, "for he only givs a penny every Sunday."

ANOTHER FALLEN CLERGYMAN.—The Philadelphia Times givs the full details of the misfortune of the popular Baptist clergyman, the Rev. Geo. A Peltz, in connection with a female amanuensis. It is said to be a sad case, by which his family is thrown into intense grief. He was in consequence forced to suddenly resign his pastorate at Jamestown, N. Y. Thus has it ever been, and probably ever will be.

THE request of the distinguished committee of clergyman, headed by President Hitchcock, that their brethren of all denominations will unite with them next Sunday in prayers that the right man may be nominated at Cincinnati and the right man at Chicago is a novelty in religion and in politics, but is likely to be taken up with enthusiasm.—Sun. Col. Ingersoll thinks if prayers of the same kind are put up for both presidential conventions it will only confuse the divine mind and result in a tie.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK waited until nearly a million copies of the disgusting book, "Nana," had been sold before he moved to suppress it, notwithstanding that his attention was directed to the gross character of the novel by Truth and other papers. When he did move, it was only to warn the small venders of literature on the railways that "they must cease selling 'Nana' if they did not wish to get into trouble." What can be the verdict of the public on the sincerity of a man who acts in this way? Are the Petersons of Philadelphia too big or too liberal to be interfered with?—Truth.

AT one time Latin quotations, and even Greek ones, were common in the speeches of the great orators in the House of Commons, as Pitt, Fox, Pulteney. Now the classics are a most dangerous ground to tread on, and are only occasionally employed by men of acknowledged great classical acquirements, like Gladstone and Lowe. Disraeli's first effort in this line, "imperium et libertas," caused at least a pleasant excitement, as neither he nor any one else could tell where it came from. In the same way classic quotations, once so common in the editorials of the Times and other leading journals, are now almost wholly banished.

THE bad faith and scurrility of the attacks of several New York papers on Col. Ingersoll hav been more than outdone by the Daily Graphic's caricature of the lecturer. This sheet, whose cuts, as a rule, are horribly inartistic, represented Ingersoll recently as a decoy light attracting solitary ships into shoals, quicksands, and rocks respectively marked as murder, immorality, and lewdness. In view of the insults heaped upon a non-believer, the news we hav just received from New Jersey to the effect that several of the largest fires hav been brought home to the door of a prominent and earnest member of a Methodist community is, to say the least, suggestive.—Truth.

WHEN Anthony Comstock, like the veritable vampire that he is, fails to reach honest people by the law, he has yet many means at his disposal for making matters uncomfortable for the victims. Thus Mr. E. Williams, who, it will be remembered, was recently acquitted of the charge of sending indecent letters by mail, has just experienced the results of Comstock's vindictiveness and intrigues to such a degree that he has been f rced to throw up his position as president of the Greenpoint Savings Bank. Comstock had induced the bank's secretary to bu'ly his superior out of office, and the secretary was not long in acquitting himself of his dirty task. However, the greater Tony's villainies may be, the greater also will be the satfaction felt by all right-minded people at this jackal's inevitable fall.—Truth.

THE military laws that now rule all Europe, with the exception of Great Britain, hav not only proved a drawback to the material prosperity of the country in which they exist, but they hav impeded the march of civilization and silenced all the demands of humanity. The cable brings us the heartrending story from Hungary of fourteen hundred persons living on grass, nettles, and mushrooms for want of other food. To escape sure death by starvation the majority of these people attempted lately to emigrate to more favorable regions, but here the military authorities pronounced a veto, and the poor wretches are now left to die in torture. By the side of this system of slow killing the Turkish mode of exterminating whole population with grape and canister is comparatively mild.

OF all religions and creeds, Christianity, such as is practiced in the present day, might rightly be considered as the most intolerant. Joseph Seligman, the noted banker, has hardly given up the ghost, bequeathing $25,000 to different benevolent charitable institutions, "without any regard to race or religion," than three or four religiously inclined evening contemporaries are found to reflect upon the fact that a certain portion of the sum has fallen to the "Society for Ethical Culture." This society is composed of advanced thinkers, mostly Hebrew, and is presided over by Felix Adler, the well-known rabbi of this city. But as these gentlemen recently declared they would practice morality for morality's sake, and not because any particular religion commends it, all true Christians are scandalized at the fact of Mr. Seligman having helped to support a society based on what they call Atheistic principles.

RELIGIOUS papers are at present hard at work attempting to prove that the sole reason enormous crowds assemble to hear Bob Ingersoll's lectures is that the noted iconoclastic Infidel possesses a marvelous self-assurance, knack of language, and histrionic talents, and that these features more than the solidity of his arguments insure his constant success. The true cause of Bob Ingersoll's popularity lies, however, farther than this, and were his arguments a million times less logical he would still be a popular figure. The people of this country, and especially those of New York, hav got sick and tired of the present perversion of Christianity by Beechers, Halls, and Talmages, who convert their churches and "tabernacles" into sensational variety shows. When the high-salaried, a la mode preachers are bounced i favor of hard-working, sincere, and talented pastors, following the precepts and maxims of the founder of their religious system, then, and not before, will Ingersoll's talents and eloquence fail to attract the large throngs that now sympathize with him.—Truth.

A COLORED brother from Arkansas givs the following reason for naming his tenth son "Judus Iscarut." Says he:

"Dat's de boy's name. Judus hez been slighted. Nobody hez eber had de immortal courage to name a chile for dat man. But dat aint de main reason wy I named him Judus. Ise got de Bible ter 'stain me in gibbin de chile dat name."

"How does the Bible sustain you in desiring to perpetuate that name?" asked the magistrate.

"It's dis fack: Christ in remarkin' ob Judus said it would hab been better fer dat man ef he hadnt been born."

"Well?"

"An considerin' how many mouts is opened at the do' wen I goes home wid a side ob meat, it would be better fur dat boy of mine of he had neber seed daylight. I takes de scriptur fur de references. In de fucher, ef I finds dat de boy hez made improvements on hisself, den I change his name ter Jim."

THE church of the Evangelist in Philadelphia will probably be sold this week under the hammer of the sheriff's auctioneer. Its vestry hav come to the conclusion that this is the only way in which they can get rid of their rector. Expert accountants hav tried to solve the mystery of the financial relations of church and rector. Rector Franklyn says the church owes him $2,703; while Warden Brown says that Mr. Franklin owes the church $900. The more the experts try to unravel the tangled accounts, the more thickly does fog gather around the figures. The church owes a mortgage debt of $3,000, with a considerable accumulation of unpaid interest. Its floating debt is about $9,000. It is said that one of the members intends to buy the concern in and start afresh under a new dispensation and with a new minister. Rector and people both are at present in a pugnacious frame of mind, and it is not likely that the gospel which was last Sunday proclaimed from the pulpit of that unhappy church was very glad tidings to the weary and foolish pilgrims who may hav wandered in there seeking spiritual refreshment.

THE Philadelphia Times in speaking of Tony Comstock's attempted suppression of Zola's "Nana," finds that the book is not interesting enough to be dangerous, and it is too insufferably dull to gain any large sale. The Times concedes that the book is "nasty," but adds that it does "not believe that anybody will be hurt by 'Nana,' because we cannot imagine that any one who could be hurt by it would hav the patience to read it through." The Philadelphia Times is mistaken in its premises and therefore in its conclusions. "Nana" has had a larger sale than any book published this year in America. The cause of this sale is its widely-advertised pruriency. To staid old gentlemen of the stamp of the editor of the Philadelphia Times, who hav long ago sown their wild oats, it may appear that mere nastiness and lewdness are not dangerous. They are not to men of his advanced age and dead appetites. But to young people whose blood flows warmly and who are ever too ready to go to extremes, a book of the peculiar stamp of "Nana" is very dangerous. Virtuous young men cannot but hav their purity tarnished by reading this outspoken and inexcusable description of the life of an abandoned Parisian woman. Truth called on Tony Comstock some time ago to suppress the sale of this book and to hav its publishers indicted. We did this because for some time, Mr. Comstock has spent his days in the persecution of small people, some of whom he has sent to state prison for books infinitely less dangerous in their tendencies than this book of "Nana." Under the ruling of Judge Benedict in the "Cupid's Yokes" case, Messrs. Peterson, of Philadelphia, could not avoid conviction and imprisonment for issuing this filthy book "Nana." If again the Messrs. Peterson were prosecuted and not convicted, it would hav a tendency to arrest Comstock in his bitter arraignment of other people for doing less than these Philadelphia publishers hav done. It is absurd for this man to prosecute D. M. Bennett and let the Petersons go in peace. In Tony Comstock's life there are few things that we approve of, but his attempt to suppress "Nana" is certainly one of them.—Truth.

THIRTY persons were poisoned in Brooklyn, N. Y., on the 21st by pie which had been prepared in copper vessels. They will probably recover.

OWING to the finding of a case of small-pox on an incoming steamer at this port, a few days since, 1,224 passengers were vaccinated before they were allowed to land.

FOUR river pirates attempted to rob a ship in this port one night last week. One was shot and drowned, and the others were captured, promptly tried, convicted, and imprisoned.

TEN inches of rain fell at Columbus, Ga., on the 21st. The railroad tracks were washed away, and travel is temporarily suspended. A train of eleven cars was wrecked and four men killed.

COL. HABBOLD, of Brooklyn, who received severe injuries by an accident on the New York Elevated Railroad, recovered thirty thousand dollars damages from the railroad company a few days since.

POLITICAL conventions are the order of the day, and all parties in every state are selecting delegates for the coming national conventions. Grant, Blaine, Tilden, Sherman, Washburne, Bayard, Thurman, and Windam are mentioned in connection with the next presidency.

THE boat race between Hanlan and Courtney for six thousand dollars, which has been talked of for months past in sporting circles, came off on the Potomac at Washington on the 19th, Hanlan winning with ease. Courtney claims to hav been sick, but many charge him with selling the race. Hanlan has been challenged by an oarsman named Riley, and will row again soon.

Abstract of Col. Ingersoll's Lecture on "What Shall We Do to be Saved?"

Fear is the dungeon of the mind and superstition the dagger with which hypocrisy assassinates the soul. It is with these instruments that the church of to-day is trying to make converts. I don't believe there is a God who givs a bird wings and damns that bird because it flies. I do not believe any God ever endowed a human being with the faculties of reason and damned him for following the holy light of that intellectual torch. You can not convince me that a crown is waiting in heaven to clasp a brainless head. Such people, it seems to me, would not make good angels. It is reasonable to suppose that once in a thousand years an agreeable sensation would be created in heaven were some Freethinking angel to vary the monotony and say, "No." I am not here to abuse the people of the church. All I contend for is intellectual liberty. I don't care what church you belong to. I don't care what creed you believe. I don't care what God you worship. All I ask is that you giv me and other people the right to assert my and their opinion.

For four thousand years the world has been asking, "What shall we do to be saved?" and they are asking the same thing to-day. The riddle has not been solved. "What shall we do to be saved?" goes up the cry—not saved from the penitentiary, not saved from grief, not saved from sickness, not saved from poverty, but—saved from the horrors of another world; saved from an inhuman fiend. Yes, an inhuman fiend; for a God could be nothing else who would take a clod of senseless, pulseless earth and make out of it a living soul to perish in the eternal fires of hell. I cannot believe in a God who is an eternal jailer. I hav no love for an infinite being who wants to run an everlasting penitentiary. This world will never be civilized while a penitentiary's walls shadow its surface, and I cannot believe in a God who shuts up his creatures for eternity in a burning furnace. Yet this is the Christian doctrine as taught by our ministers. They say I'll be damned if I don't believe it; I say I will if I do. Now don't be uneasy, for I'm not going to ask you to do anything unreasonable. All I ask of you is to get every form of superstition out of your mind. Rid yourself of the belief that you will make the Infinite Being mad by being honest; that you can be bad enough to start a famine or breed a pestilence. Don't flatter yourself that you are that important. You are only one poor, inoffensive human being. If not a man, woman, or child existed on this planet the dells would still blossom with beautiful daisies, and each daisy would be kissed by the jeweled drop of dew; the birds would sing just as sweetly in the branches of the forest trees. What I want you to do is to liv and enjoy the good things which hav been given you. I don't believe any man should drink buttermilk all his life for the sake of a chance to get butter in heaven.

We hav what we call a Christian system—a scheme of salvation. According to this system—this scheme—a God made a world and then created a man and a woman to inherit it. He put the man and woman in a garden, and told them they might do as they pleased in everything but one—they musn't eat any of the apples of a certain tree. Now if he didn't want them to eat his apples why did he put the apple tree there? If I didn't want a man to steal my apples, I would not pen him up in my orchard. But this man and woman didn't obey God. The devil tempted the woman and the woman tempted the man, and they disobeyed his commands. The devil raised the rebellion, yet God created the devil. Why did God create a rival, and that rival is ahead to-day? He's ahead in this city to-night counting the five hundred Methodist ministers. Why don't God kill him? I don't know. But I do know that if the devil died to-night orthodoxy would be an orphan to-morrow morning. No devil, no sin; no sin, no atonement; no atonement, no preach; no preach, no pay. This scheme of salvation is a beautiful one to contemplate. The first child born was a murderer—not a very good start. God didn't even giv his first children a Bible. Why didn't he giv them a few leaves to start on? He didn't present them with a tract. They didn't even hav a Young Men's Christian Association to keep them straight. Now, how in the world could anybody expect Adam and his immediate descendants to be saved? I can prove by every minister in this city that salvation without the Bible is impossible. Yes, I can. But they didn't hav a Bible—not a chapter of one. They didn't even hav a Methodist minister. So, of course, they got very bad—these children of God—so bad that he had to drown them all but eight. Yet this God wants to tell me how to raise my children. But he saved eight to start a new stock, and these eight were totally depraved. A nice set to start up a new people! After a while we are told that this wise God thought he would try his hand at a new race, and he selected the Hebrews. He ignored the Hindoos, with their magnificent poetry and art. He paid no attention to educated Greece. He totally overlooked the Roman people, with their advanced civilization, and turned his opportunities toward the traiving of the Hebrew tribe. He made a great many laws for them, and tried to effect their civilization. He told them to kill their wives and swallow up their babes. After trying it for two thousand years he got them so much civilized that they turned around and killed him. What is funny about it he must hav known all along that they would kill him, yet he stuck to them and kept civilizing the whole tribe. After they killed him he deserted them, and it was only when he gave them over to the devil as a bad lot that they began to prosper. To-day they are the most prosperous people on the globe. They hav more wealth and fewer paupers among their numbers than any other people in existence, but they never got along till God let them alone. That was a part of the scheme of salvation, however.

Another part of the scheme is that I must suffer for the sins of Adam because they tell me he was my representative. Who made him my representative? I don't own him. I wasn't in the caucus that nominated him. I hav no desire to be a charity angel. When I come to square up accounts I want to settle by the books and then I'll feel settled. But you must believe this scheme of salvation, they tell me. Why? Because it is in the New Testament. Is it? Well, what of it? Who wrote it? I don't know. They say God wrote it. Did he? Then why did God not authenticate it? Why didn't he put his signature to it? We hav no account of God ever writing anything but once, when he wrote something in the sand. That, however, has not been preserved. Hav we any account of his disciples writing anything? Not a line. Who did write the New Testament? Has anybody ever seen the original manuscript? Has anybody ever heard of anybody who saw it? It is admitted by the best scholars of this day that Matthew wrote nothing of it; that John wrote nothing of it; that Mark wrote nothing of it; that Luke wrote nothing of it. Every preacher in this city knows that these four ancient gentlemen never wrote a line of the New Testament, but they hav forgotten to tell it. No doubt they will thank me for doing it for them. Shall I tell you how these four gospels were made? They were in the hands of people who professed to do miracles—to raise the dead, and all that. No honest man would claim to be able to raise the dead. Yet these men had the making, the translating, and the doctoring of the four gospels of the New Testament. These are the men who were at the head of the church. Men who would stop at nothing to further their scheme of salvation. Giv the church absolute power and this would be the last lecture I would ever deliver.

They call me an unbeliever. I don't mind it. Christ was an unbeliever. Yes, he was. He laughed at their temples of worship and forms of religion. On several occasions he went for the scribes and Pharisees, who were the preachers and bishops of that time.

If he were living now I guess he would say just as hard things about some of the preachers of this day. I believe most Christians and preachers are tolerably honest, but I don't believe all the ministers tell all their doubts. Yet your doubts are the sharpest things of the brain; they are the flutterings of discovery. I wouldn't exchange a doubt for all the faith in the world.

These preachers are telling us how to be saved. They call me very wicked. I'm an Infidel. Yet they wouldn't burn me up. Oh, no. That would be infamous. But they bow down and pay homage to a being whom they teach is eternally engaged in burning people up. They worship this God who would burn me up. What do you think of a God who would not tolerate religious liberty? Well, sirs, we are taught that to be saved we must read the Bible with a belief that every word is true, and that if we doubt a word of it we shall be eternally lost.

Now, what shall we do to be saved? That's a very interesting question. If there is a hell I don't want to get there. I am just as anxious as any of these Methodist preachers to be an angel of light and joy forever. I want to be saved. Well, they say, read the New Testament and believe all it tells you. Let us see what the New Testament tells us. The first book professes to be the writings of Mr. Matthew. Now Matthew never wrote a line of it. But admitting that he did, let's see what he says. Does he say to get to heaven I must believe in the scheme? Not once. Does he say I must believe in the Lord Jesus Christ? Not once. Does he say I must perform a miracle? Not once. What does he say I must do to be saved? The first word on that subject is found in the account of the Sermon on the Mount: "Blessed are the pure in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." That's my doctrine.

"Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." That's my doctrine—it's grand.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." How glorious is that teaching!

"Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." That's me!

"The merciful shall obtain mercy." That's my doctrine. Christ and I agree on that point. I cannot conceive of a merciful God who can eternally damn a merciful man. There's sense in that. If they'd preach this doctrine in the pulpit I'd be a member of the church myself. If you will forgive others God will forgive you. If that be true then theology is a lie. Imagine God damning a merciful man who looks up to heaven and forgives God for doing it. How would God feel over it, do you think? It won't do. In another place Matthew says you shall giv account of your works on the last great day. If that is so it will go pretty hard with some of the preachers.

Does it say every one shall be judged by his church? No. By his faith? No. By the time he was born? No; but he shall be judged by his works. That's my doctrine. Unless you become as one of these ye can in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven. What a sweet cherub John Calvin must hav made! What a dimpled infant Jonathan Edwards!

Further along we hav the young man coming to Christ and asking this same tough question, "Good Master, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" Christ answered him: "Keep the commandments." The young man frankly put the second question: "Which one?" That was fair and square. It was a bland question. Then Christ replied: "Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," etc. He didn't tell him he must believe in him as the son of God. Not even to keep Sunday nor to read the Bible. Neither that it was necessary to be baptized and to believe in the atonement. If Christ was keeping this from the young man he was practicing deception, and wasn't honest. But he told him it was necessary only to keep the commandments. The young man replied that all these things he had kept from his youth up. I don't believe him, but Christ did and supplemented it with the advice to go sell what he had and giv to the poor and he should hav treasure in heaven. Treasure in heaven is what the church is always holding up to tempt their people, but I notice they are always willing to swop heavenly treasures for cash down. Now this is what Christ told the young man, to keep the commandments. I don't believe he said anything about selling his property and giving to the poor. The fellows who hav doctored the Bible put that in, being hard up. They were hard up again and made Christ say to the young man still further that it is harder for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. That's a very nice doctrine—for the church. But did you ever know a rich Christian to unload? I didn't. They all make themselves believe that the camel, by a little squeezing, might get through, so they hold on till death comes along, when maybe at the last moment they compromise with God at five per cent to build or endow a church or theological seminary. Oh, no; Christ never said anything about the camel and the needle's eye. He said "honor thy father and thy mother." So Matthew says in one chapter. Turn right over, and you will find he tells the same young man he can never enjoy eternal life except by deserting his mother and his father. I would like one of the five hundred Methodist ministers in the city to explain the contradiction. As for me, I will not desert my wife and children for an eternal life or a crown. Just imagine a man knocking at the heavenly gate for admission. Peter will ask, "What hav you done to deserve admission?" "Oh," he will say, "I hav deserted my wife and four little children." Then Peter will tell him to step right inside, where he will find a reserved seat marked "Taken." Another man comes along and he is eternally damned because he has stood by his children and wife. You can do more good, my friends, by loving your wife than by loving God. I'll tell you why. She needs it, God don't. He can get along without it. You can plant a flower in every footprint of your wife's journey through the world. Better love your wife and children who are alive than to desert them and love God, who has been dead 1,800 years.

The practices of the church are in some cases cruel. As if God wants a girl of sixteen to shut herself up in a prison convent to blast and deform the beauty of her sweet life. When I think of such things I feel as though the law ought not to tolerate it. The law ought not to allow these theological spiders to weave their pernicious webs to catch the souls of innocent girls. It ought to stretch out the strong arm of interference. But souls must be saved, they say. Now I hav noticed all my life that people who hav the smallest souls make the most fuss about their salvation.

My religion is not selfish. I am going to heaven and take my wife and children along. I serve notice to this effect on these preachers to-night. If I can't go to heaven with my wife and children I will go to hell with them. The idea of a man deserting his family for a crown.

Following up the teachings of Christ as written down by Matthew, or said to be recorded by him, we find Christ telling how to be saved. "Visit those in prison, clothe the naked, feed the hungry, and see the sick. For inasmuch as ye hav done it unto the least of these thou hast done it unto me." Now I like that giving water to the thirsty, visiting prisons, feeding the tramp, and clothing the poor. Here is real Christianity. That is good salvation doctrine, and it was taught by Christ. He doesn't say one word about the apple or lion story; not one word of the Meshack, Shadrach, and Abednego story; not one word about the jackass making his little speech. And do you know I never see one of those "Replies to Ingersoll" but that I think of that jackass making his speech. Matthew tells us all these things which Jesus Christ taught. He says nothing about Christ insisting on people believing in him to be saved. Matthew was with Christ three years, and if anything of this kind was said Matthew forgot it. All this doctrine of love and mercy, and justice, and liberality, and devotion to one's family is good, and I admire it. It is all good, but the doctrine of deserting one's folks. Let us see what Mr. Mark says. He says just what Mr. Matthew said until he comes to the sixteenth chapter and sixteenth verse. Here we find the account of the last conversation with Christ. It occurred after he had been killed and was about to start to heaven. Mark makes Christ say, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned. "Christ never said anything of the kind. Why? Because only one of the four evangelists makes mention of it. They were all there. These were asserted to be Christ's last words, and should hav impressed themselves on the minds of every one who heard them. Yet nobody seems to hav remembered them but Mark. I don't believe Christ said this, because I know, as he must hav known, that no man can control his belief. There is no sense in it. In another place we are told that these signs shall follow those who believe: They shall drink deadly thinks and it shall not hurt them. I should like to mix up a dose and try it on some of the elect to-day. If it doesn't hurt them I'll join the church myself. "They shall cast out devils in my name." Here's an opportunity not to be slighted. Let the three hundred preachers in the city this week try their hand on a little devil and cast him out.

Spiritualism and Materialism.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

"When Bishop Berkeley said there was no matter,
And proved it, 'twas no matter what he said;
They say his system 'tis in vain to batter.
Too subtle for the ablest human head;
And yet who can believe it? I would shatter
Gladly all matter down to stone or lead,
Or adamant, to find the world a spirit,
And wear my head denying that I wear it."

Whether spirit be matter, or matter spirit, or each the other, or the twain so obviously one as not to be rigidly defined in the many aspects, may well be left to each one's mode of working the problem. Tyndall and others of his cast admit there may be a universal ether. Well, ether is so near of kin to spirit that we may readily suppose the grosser forms of matter to be only the excretia of this ether or spirit, to be cast off as the serpent casts its skin. Milton thought spirit and matter to be nearly one:

"Endowed with various forms, various degrees
Of substance, and, in things that liv, of life;
But more refined, more spirituous and pure,
As nearer to him placed, or nearer tending,
Each in their several active spheres assigned,
Till body up to spirit worked, in bounds
Proportioned to each kind."

Thus we may hav millions of spirits more or less etherealistic or incarnate according to the exigencies of the evolutions or progressive modes of being.

Modern Spiritualism has now been before the public some thirty years, and it has done much in loosening the foundations of the old theologies. Making allowance for all errors which may hav obscured its various phases, it has been found to be true by thousands of seekers when fully and squarely examined. It is not a question of argument, but of facts, though the facts should seemingly be in collision with established boundaries of nature; but nature is boundless, and not contradictory, and may be found to hav modes of being beyond the landmarks which scientists hav set up, saying, "Thus far and no farther," as per "consensus of the competent."

We were fortunate in our researches in having a private medium through whom we could and did experiment for years, and to us Spiritualism, or the intercommunication between fleshed and unfleshed intelligences, was long ago completely proved; objectively so—as facts in scientific formulas would be proved. Indeed, what we cannot reconcile with the sensible courses of nature we should not count into the sense of the matters.

We hav no censure, however, for those who hav fallen short of such proof. Spiritualism has no need to say, "Believe or be damned." We leave to the churches to do the work of damnation.

Often it is asked, of what use is Spiritualism, even if true? Being true, it demonstrates the immortality of the soul, or spiritual body; and this being substantial, or in connection with more ethereal matter, may be considered as material if you rather. The new world, we are assured by our friends there, is as tangible—and even more so to its inhabitants—as this grosser world is to us in our submerged estate.

To us, Spiritualism is the pearl of great price. So great that if all the present world could offer were in one scale, and Spiritualism in the other, we should prefer the latter. Others choose differently, and would prefer an endless sleep to any awaking in the spirit land. Of course we would prefer the truth above all things, and rejoice very much to hav found it in the Spiritual unfolding. We feel very thankful to our spirit friends for helping us to remove the veil so that we come to a larger vision. We do what we can to help others. They are not necessarily good or bad people for believing more or less, as the churches hav represented; hence Spiritualists and Materialists, if large minds, can work together, having a common aim—to free humanity from the degrading bondage of priestcraft aud superstition.

The Bible phenomena were only the varying Spiritualisms of old times, mingled with the nature-worship in personifications essentially alike in Gentiledom or Hebrewdom, whether in oracles or "Thus saith the Lord"—nothing supernatural, nothing miraculous, nor even superhuman, for the spiritual or soul world is simply of men, women, and children, with the better surroundings than this grosser world could afford, and yet more or less correspondent to the things of this world. What we are now, with whatever improvements we may make in our growth or evolution, we shall carry with us, nor can the death of the grosser or more material body annihilate the powers of the soul. Such has been our experience. Others may hav had different experiences, for many are the aspects in which the light shineth unto the darkness.

The ancient prophets, seers, or godmen were the same as our mediums of to-day, very fallible, to be sure, and the oracles by them are to be taken for no more than they are worth. The so-called God's Word is to be taken with many grains of allowance, for the mesmerism and Spiritualism of those days were subject to the same laws or modes of being as now, blending the two worlds through the magnetic aura or ether. The ancient "lords many and gods many," when not the heavenly or sky-father—sun and various forces in personifications—were the same as our angels or spirits of to-day. In the light of the modern unfoldings, we hav the various keys wherewith to open the ancient heavens, from the bottomless pit of Satan to the highest copings of his counterpart in the Jehovah-Godhead. Even Jesus, if he ever lived as a person, can only be counted as a Radical reformer and medium, a beautiful soul, tender-hearted and sympathetic with the afflicted, though some untoward things are set down to his name; or he may hav been an impersonal mode of being, as Christ the spirit, as one with the ethereal King Sun or Sky Father—he, she, or it in which or whom we all liv, move, and hav our being. We do not learn that there is any personal God in the other world more than in this, save in the degree of the progressive humanity, and thus on earth as it is in heaven, by living upward and forward in all the truth we can find. No blood-theologies, vicarious atonements, or other fossildoms of the stereotyped creeds avail to save in Spiritualism. No dismissal of the hardened soul to heaven direct from the gallows or otherwise, but all must work out their own salvation and redeem themselves by works meet for repentance on this and the other side of Jordan. So much the better we liv, so much the easier is the road to travel.

Among the best people we hav ever known hav been those termed Atheists or Infidels. Why then should we not work with them? We are not Pharisees, deeming ourselves the more holy by heartless assumptions. The Truth Seeker, each week, spreads out for us a banquet worthy of the gods; and with such a large variety we hav no difficulty in being harmonious with the many divergences of taste, for are we not all engaged in the endeavor to supply something better than the old bread from heaven, with its funeral baked meats as fed to us by the devotees of the Christian creed? It may be a laborious process to work out of the old grooving. It was so to us. Beginning far back to know what truth might be found in the old theologies, we searched them on every hand, and became "rooted and grounded" in Materialism. In those days this life bounded all. We hav passed into a larger vision, but find no reason for telling those who see not as we see to "see or be damned."

We know well the ground of the Materialists, for we walked their plane many years. We used the same arguments that they now use. It was in order then to do so, for the modern phenomena had not then become visible in the sight of all Israel and the sun. There were in those days only the narrow bounds of fossil theologians, who assumed the supernatural and miraculous without any proof beyond the ignorance of old times; but in the upward and onward movement of the present, a new world has been so far discovered as to prove that death is only the terminus of the outer body, and that the life, soul, or ethereal mode of being is more than ever of the same identity as first manifest in the flesh, though often difficult to be made so manifest through the medium. When Herbert Spencer decides offhand without full examination that Spiritualism cannot be true, he is unscientific, and so of Tyndall, Huxley, Haeckel, Maudsley, Popular Science Monthly, etc., who suppose themselves to embrace the whole compass of nature. But they are short of the terminus, for there are more things in heaven and earth than are embraced within their material bounds. We know their groundwork, and from beyond their bounds—know them to be mistaken. When the leaders in the old theologies joined them in the raid against modern Spiritualism, it was clear to be seen that the churches led by such leaders, would be ground to powder between the upper and the nether millstones, thus making true that "whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." The clergy and churches, with noble exceptions, hav been weighed and found wanting.

The Rev. Joe Cook, floundering in the meshes of modern Spiritualism, knowing nothing of its warp and woof, or how to adjust them, is crying lustily to the churches to come to the front to take the lead of Spiritualism. Too late! Not Hercules himself could draw them from the horrible pit of miry clay in which they hav so long been bedded.

What a mighty work Col. Ingersoll is doing to break every yoke and let the oppressed go free! and if he should happen to be, with passive mind, in the presence of a proper medium, he might find the brother he so much loved and mourned as dead, not to be dead but living; and the brave Colonel would then be so much strengthened in the glorious work he is to do. We admit that it is very much a matter of brain formation or organization, as the material with which the more ethereal must work, whereby we are the more or less captive or open to the manifestations of the spirit. Mr. O. B. Frothingham has, on various occasions, borne testimony to the great results of modern Spiritualism in undermining the old theologies, yet in conversation with him, a few years ago, he declared himself to be of those minds so organized that they cannot receive Spiritualism as agreeing with the reality of things. But,

"Shall I ask the brave soldier who fights by my side
In the cause of mankind if our creeds agree?
Shall I giv up the friend I hav valued and tried
If he kneel not before the same altar with me?
From the heretic girl of my soul should I fly,
To seek somewhere else a more orthodox kiss?
No! perish the hearts and the laws that try Truth, valor, or love by a standard like this."

C. B. Peckham.
